"I judge from your accent that you are Italian, as she is."

"Yes, Sir, I am a Venetian."

"So is she."

After this exchange with her emissary, the Chevalier told me in a few words that she was a dancer with whom the Count of Ricla,[58] Captain-General (for there was no longer a Viceroy) of the Principality of Barcelona, was in love and whom he was keeping in Valencia for a few weeks until he could arrange her return to Barcelona, where the Bishop would not tolerate her presence because of the scandal. He told me that he had allowed her fifty doblones a day.

"But she does not spend them, I hope."

"She cannot, but she indulges in some folly every day which costs him a great deal of money."

Extremely curious to make the acquaintance of such a woman, and far from fearing that the acquaintance would be sure to cause me unhappiness, I could not wait for the performance to be over so that I could speak with her.

It was on the stairs that I approached her, paying her the usual sort of compliment, which she unabashedly returned, resting her hand, which despite her rings and her bracelets proved to be very beautiful, on mine. Arrived at her carriage, to which six mules were harnessed, she says that she will be glad if I will come to breakfast with her the next day; I promise to do myself the honor.

I do not fail to keep the appointment. I find her in a very large house, a hundred paces outside the city, the whole of which she rented and which was well furnished though without taste, and open to the air of the countryside, with gardens in front and behind. I see menservants in livery, maids coming and going, and I hear an imperious voice scolding in the apartment into which I was shown. The scolding voice was La Nina's, who was dressing down a man who was standing in amazement in front of an array of merchandise on a big table. She asks me to forgive her for being angry with the fool of a Spaniard who insisted on maintaining that his laces, which I saw there, were excellent. She wants me to look at them and give my opinion, and I say that I am no judge of lace. The man, losing patience, says to her that if the laces do not please her she has only to leave them to him, and he asks her if she wants the fabrics.

"I will keep the fabrics, and as for your laces I want to convince you that it is not to save money that I refuse them. Look!"

And she picks up a great pair of scissors and cuts them to bits. The man who had been with her at the bullring the day before told me that it was a pity, and that everyone in Valencia would call her mad.

"Be still, pimp."

Treating him to which fine epithet, she gives him a slap with the back of her hand. He leaves, calling her a whore.[59] She bursts out laughing. She tells the trembling Spaniard to write out a bill at once for all that she had bought, and he instantly obeys, avenging himself well for all the insults to which she had treated him. She signs, objecting to none of the prices, and she tells him to go to Don Diego Valencia, who will pay him at once. The man leaves, chocolate is brought, she makes me sit down beside her, and she sends to tell the man who had called her a whore to come at once to drink chocolate with us.

"Do not be surprised," she says, "at the way I treat him, for he is nothing but a clown whom Ricla keeps with me to spy on what I do. I treat him badly on purpose, so that he will write him everything."

To tell the truth I thought I was dreaming, or that the woman must be mad. In all my life I had never seen or imagined that a woman of such a character could exist. The unfortunate Bolognese, who was a musician and whose name was Molinari,[60] came and drank his chocolate without saying a word. He left afterward, and she spent a whole hour with me talking of Spain, of Italy, of Portugal, where she had married a dancer named Bergonzi. She told me that she was the daughter of Pelandi, the famous charlatan who sold the "Oil of Strazzon" in Venice, and whom I might have known. And in fact I had known him, just as everyone in Venice must have known him on the platform where he sold his balsam.[61]

After this confidence, which she imparted with so little reserve as to make it not one, she asked me to do her the favor of coming to sup with her, for supper was her favorite meal; I promised I would do so, and I went for a walk, reflecting on this strange phenomenon and on the great good fortune which the woman treated in such a fashion. After what I had seen I had to believe that she really had fifty doblones a day. She was of the most surprising beauty, but since I was of the opinion that beauty alone is not enough to make a man love, I did not understand how the Viceroy of Catalonia could be in love with her to such a degree. As for Molinari, after what I had seen and heard I had no doubt that he must be an infamous scoundrel, the most despicable of men. I would go to supper there to enjoy the performance, for, beautiful though she was,[62] she had not aroused the least sensation in me.

Toward nightfall I make my way to her house. It was the beginning of October; but in Valencia the weather was as hot as it is with us in August. She was walking in the garden with her jackanapes,[63] both of them nearly undressed, for she had on only a shift and petticoat and he only drawers. She invites me to make myself comfortable in the same way; but I offer excuses which she accepts as good, and I am glad, for the presence of the base scoundrel utterly shocked and revolted me. It was she who amused me until suppertime with talk than which nothing could be more lewd. She told me any number of stories of fuc. . . . ,[64] in which she was the principal figure, which had happened to her in the twenty-two years of her life.

All these stories would have had the effect they should have had on me, though without arousing love, were it not for the presence of the fellow with his revolting countenance and his abysmal stupidity. At table we were all very hungry; the supper was choice, with both meat and fish, the wine was excellent, I was well satisfied, and I should have been glad to go home; but she had no such intention. The wine had affected her, the clown was drunk, she wanted to be gay. She sent everyone away, she insisted on his undressing, and performed experiments on him which are too filthy and disgusting to commit to paper. The buffoon was young, and his drunkenness did not prevent him from attaining a state which did him honor under Nina's ministrations. It was obvious that the lascivious Nina wanted me to serve her in an orgy in the wretched scoundrel's presence; but his presence deprived me of the ability to satisfy Nina, who, without looking at me, had stripped naked. When she saw that I persisted in being inactive, she made use of the man, inviting me, if I wanted to amuse myself, to come and see how he went about it. I went reluctantly, suffering the torments of the damned, not from any desire to do what he was doing, for I was in a state of impotence, but from anger at seeing such a beautiful woman surrender herself to a man whose only merit was that of a donkey.

After she made him work until his powers were exhausted, she washed her parts, then she forced him to drink, and the swine vomited up his whole supper; she ran off into the other room, shrieking with laughter, and I followed her, for the stench was making me nauseous. After laughing her fill, seated beside me stark naked, she asked me how I had liked the entertainment. At that, my honor and my self-esteem demanded that I justify myself. I told her that my antipathy to the base fellow was so great that it had raised an insuperable obstacle to the effect which her charms should have on any man with eyes.

"I think it possible, for he is very ugly; but he is not here now, and yet you are still nothing. One would not think it to look at you."

"And rightly, my dear Nina, for I am as good as any other man; but at the moment it would be impossible. He has left me too disgusted. No, I beg you, it is no use, nothing will come of it; but it can happen tomorrow, if you do not offend my sight with a monster who is unworthy to enjoy you."

"You are mistaken, he does not enjoy it. I make him work. If I could suppose that he loved me, I would die rather than satisfy him, for I loathe him."

"What! You do not love him, and you use him to give yourself the pleasure of love?"

"As I would use a dildo." [35]

I found nothing in all that Nina said but the pure truth of a depraved nature. She urged me to come to supper the next day, saying that she wanted to see if what I said was true or false, and assuring me that Molinari would be ill.

"He will have got over the effect of the wine, and he will be well."

"No, he will be ill. Come, and come every evening."

"I leave day after tomorrow. I have already reserved my place."

"My friend, you shall not leave. You will leave in a week, after I do."

"That is impossible."

"You shall not leave, I tell you; it would be an insult which I would not stomach."

I did not contradict her, and I went home firmly intending to leave in spite of her. Though at my age I was no longer a novice in anything, I went to bed astonished at the woman's licentiousness, at her freedom of speech and action, and, even more, at her frankness, for she had confessed to me what no woman had ever confessed to anyone.

"I use him to do that because I am sure he does not love me. If I knew he loved me I would die rather than satisfy him, for I loathe him."

I knew about that sort of thing, but no woman had ever put it into words to me.

The next day at seven o'clock in the evening I went to her house. She told me with affected regret that we should sup alone, for Molinari had a very bad colic.

"You told me before that he would be ill. Have you poisoned him?"

"I wouldn't put it beyond me, but God preserve me from doing it."

"But you assured me he would be ill, and he is ill. So you must have given him something."

"No. Let us not speak of it. Let us play cards; afterward we will sup, and we will amuse ourselves until tomorrow, and tomorrow evening we will do it again."

"No, for I shall leave at seven o'clock."

"You shall not leave, and the coachman will not complain to you, for he has been paid. Here is his receipt."

All this being said in the playful tone of a love determined to have its way, I did not think it offensive. Being in no hurry to leave, I took it in good part, calling her a madcap and saying that I was not worth the present she had made me.

"It is astonishing," I said, "that, being what you are, and with such a fine house, you do not receive company."

"Everyone is afraid. They fear Ricla, who is in love and jealous and to whom the knave with the colic writes everything I do. He says he doesn't, but I am sure of it; I am even delighted that he writes to him, and sorry that until now he has had nothing of consequence to report."

"He will write him that I sup with you alone."

"So much the better. Are you afraid?"

"No. But I think you ought to tell me if I have reason to be afraid."

"None at all, for he can blame only me."

"But I should not want to be the cause of a falling out which would harm you."

"On the contrary, the more I irritate him, the more he will love me, and making it up will cost him dear."

"Then you do not love him?"

"I love him to ruin him; but he is so rich that it is impossible."

I saw before me a woman beautiful as an angel, black as a devil, an atrocious whore[66] born to punish every man who to his misfortune fell in love with her. I had known others of the same sort, but never one to equal her. I thought of turning her wickedness to profit by laying her under contribution. She sent for cards and invited me to play what is called primero.[67] It is a game of chance, but so complicated that the most careful player always wins. In less than a quarter of an hour I saw that I played it better than she did; but her luck was so great that when we stopped to go to supper I counted up the points and I found that I was the loser by eighteen or twenty pistoles, which I immediately paid her and which she took, at the same time promising me my revenge. We supped well, and after supper I joined her in all the amorous follies for which she asked and of which I was capable, for my great days were over. However, she declared herself satisfied, and she let me go home when I told her I needed to sleep.

The next day I went to her house earlier, we played, and she lost, and she lost on all of the five or six days she remained in Valencia, so the hussy yielded me a profit of nearly two hundred doblones, which at the time I could not regard with indifference. The spy had already recovered from his colic the next day, and he always supped with us, but his presence was no hindrance to me after she stopped prostituting herself with him in my presence. She had taken the opposite course. She gave herself to me, telling him to go and write to Count Ricla, whereupon he withdrew.

She finally received a letter from the Count, which she gave me to read. He told her in good Italian that she could return to Barcelona without fear, for the Bishop had received an order from the Court to consider her simply an actress who was traveling by way of Barcelona, so she could spend all the rest of the winter there and be sure that she would be left in peace, provided that she lived quietly and caused no scandal. She told me that during the whole of my stay in Barcelona I could visit her only at night after the Count had gone; which he always did at ten o'clock. She assured me that I ran no risk. I should perhaps not have stopped there at all had she not told me that, if I should be short of money, she would lend me as much as I needed. She insisted that I leave a day before her and stop to wait for her at the inn in Tarragona, which I did. I spent the day very pleasantly in that city full of ancient monuments.

I had a very choice supper prepared for Nina, as she had ordered me to do, as well as a room for her next to mine, so that I could sleep with her without causing a scandal. She left in the morning, after telling me not to leave until toward nightfall so that I should be in Barcelona the following morning, where I was to lodge at the "Santa Maria."[68] She also ordered me not to go to see her until after she had written me a note. I did everything she prescribed, and I arrived in Barcelona at daybreak. It is only twenty leagues from Tarragona. The proprietor of the "Santa Maria" inn lodged me very comfortably. He was an old Swiss. He told me privately that he had received orders from La Nina to treat me well and show me every consideration.

CHAPTER V

My imprudent conduct. Passano. My detention in the Tower. My departure from Barcelona. La Castel-Bajac at Montpellier. Nîmes. My arrival at Aix-en-Provence.

I THOUGHT this action of La Nina's very imprudent, even though the innkeeper seemed to be a sensible, discreet man; for after all she was the mistress of the Captain-General, who might be a man of intelligence but who, as a Spaniard, could not be of an easygoing nature in the matter of a love affair. Indeed, she had described him to me as ardent, suspicious, and jealous by temperament; but the thing was done.

I went to bed, I slept until two o'clock, and on waking I found an excellent dinner, a local manservant, and the innkeeper, come to tell me that he vouched for him. I withdraw to my room with him, and I ask him if it is by Nina's order that he has found me the manservant, and he replies that it is, and that he has also seen to arranging for the weekly hire of the carriage I see at the door.

"I am surprised that La Nina goes to so much trouble, for it is only I who have the right to regulate my expenditures."

"Señor, everything is paid for."

"Everything is paid for? I beg you to believe no such thing, for I will never allow it."

"You shall settle matters with her, but meanwhile you may be sure that I will not accept a copper."

At that moment I foresaw many difficulties, but the unpleasant thought did not possess me long enough. I had a letter of recommendation from the Marquis of Mora to Don Miguel de Cevaillos[1] and another from Colonel Rojas to Don Diego de la Secada.[2] I went at once to deliver the letters. The next morning Don Diego came to see me and took me to call on the Count of Peralada;[3] and on the day after that Don Miguel presented me to the Count of Ricla, Captain-General in command of the Principality of Catalonia, Cavaliere of San Gennaro,[4] and the lover of the vicious beauty who made it appear that she was keeping me.

The Count of Peralada was a young, rich nobleman, handsome of countenance, short and ill-built, a great debauchee who loved bad company, an enemy of religion, morals, and public order, violent and proud of his birth, directly descended from the Count of Peralada who had served Philip II so well that he had earned a patent in which that famous King declared him Count "by the grace of God." It was the first parchment I read in his anteroom, on a table covered with glass. He kept it there so that all those who went to see him could read it during the quarter of an hour he kept them waiting, perhaps for no other reason. He received me with the free, easy manner of a great nobleman who renounces everything due to him because of his high birth. He thanked Don Diego for having brought me to call on him, and he talked to me at length about Colonel Rojas. He asked me if I had made the acquaintance of the Englishwoman he was keeping in Saragossa, and when I said that I had, he whispered to me that he had slept with her. After taking me to see his stables, where he had splendid horses, he invited me to dinner the next day.

My reception from the Captain-General was very different; he received me standing, so that he would not have to offer me a chair, and, having heard me address him in Italian, he replied in Spanish, giving me the title “Usía”[5] in return for the “Excellency” which, as in duty bound, I had given him. He talked to me at length about Madrid, and he complained of the Venetian Ambassador Mocenigo, who, instead of going to Paris by way of Barcelona, as he had promised him he would do, had gone by way of Bordeaux. I thought I might excuse the Ambassador by telling the Count that the other route saved him fifty leagues; but he replied that keeping la palabra (“his word”) would have been better. He asked me if I expected to make a long stay in Barcelona, and I surprised him by replying that, with his permission, I should stay there as long as I found that I was enjoying it.

“I hope,” he said, “that you will enjoy it, but I warn you that the pleasures which my nephew Peralada can procure you will not give you a good reputation in Barcelona.”

Since the Count had made this remark to me in public, I thought I might repeat it to Señor de Peralada the same day at table. It delighted him. He told me, as if boasting of it, that he had made three journeys to Madrid, and that each time the Court had ordered him to return to Catalonia. However, I followed the Count of Ricla’s advice; I refused all the parties which Peralada offered me with girls, both in the country and at supper at his house. On the fifth day an officer came to invite me to dine at the Captain-General’s, an invitation which very much pleased me, for I feared that, having heard of the life I lived in Valencia with his Nina, he would hold it against me. At table he addressed me several times, but always with a seriousness which forbade me to venture on a jest.

After a week during which, to my surprise, Nina never wrote me to visit her, I received a note in which she told me to come to her house at ten o'clock in the evening, on foot and without a servant. It is certain that, not being in love with her, I ought not to have gone; by not going, I should have been both prudent and wise, and I should have shown the Count of Ricla a respect which I owed him; but I was neither wise nor prudent. I had not yet had misfortunes enough in my life to have learned to be so. During the week I had constantly seen La Nina at the theater,[6] but I had never bowed to her.

At the appointed hour I went there alone, wearing a greatcoat and with only my sword. She was with her sister, who was fifteen or sixteen years older than she and who was married to a comic dancer called Squizza (Schizza[7] in Italian), because he had scarcely any nose. She had just supped with the Captain-General, who had left at a quarter before ten o'clock; it was his unchanging hour. She said she was delighted that I had dined with him, and the more so because it was she who had mentioned me to him, praising me and congratulating herself on my having kept her good company for a week or ten days in Valencia.

"Excellent, my dear friend; but I think you ought not to have me call on you at unwonted hours."

"It is to avoid giving the neighbors any occasion for malicious gossip."

"On the contrary, it is to give them one, and to put suspicions into the Count's mind."

"He cannot learn of it."

I left at midnight, after a conversation than which nothing more decorous could be imagined. Her sister, though she was far from scrupulous, had never left us alone together, and in her presence Nina neither did nor said anything which could make her suppose we had been much more intimately acquainted in Valencia. During the following days I went there every evening; she begged me to come, it gave her pleasure; nothing happened between us which would displease the Count if he chose to inquire into it. I went, and I feared nothing. But now for what ought to have made me stop going there.

An officer of the Walloon Guards[8] comes up to me one day at noon outside the city, where I was walking alone. He politely asks me to excuse him if, without the warrant of any friendship between us, he was going to speak to me about something which should be of concern to me, though he had no connection with it and no right to interfere in it.

"Speak, Señor, I cannot but take in good part whatever you may be kind enough to say to me."

"Very well. You are a foreigner, perhaps you do not know this city or Spanish customs, and so you do not know that you run a great risk by going every night to call on La Nina as soon as the Count leaves."

"What risk can I run? I would wager that the Count knows it, and that he has no objection to it."

"It is certain that he knows it, and that he perhaps pretends to her that he does not know it, for he fears her as much as he loves her. If she does not tell you that he objects to it, either she is deceiving you or he is deceiving her, for it is impossible that he loves her without being jealous of her. Take my advice, and pardon me. Go there no more!"

"I thank you, but I shall not take your advice. It would be discourteous to her, who receives me very well, and who enjoys my company as much as I enjoy hers. I shall not stop going there until she orders me to stop, or until the Count lets me know that my visits to his mistress offend him."

"He will never do that, for he would consider it humiliating."

The worthy officer then recounted to me all the injustices and arbitrary acts of violence which he had committed since he had fallen in love with the woman, who made him do whatever she wanted. Men whom he suspected of loving her dismissed from his service, others banished, others sent to prison, on specious pretexts.

"This man," he added, "who holds so high a post and who before he knew that Messalina was a model of justice and virtue, has become, since he made her acquaintance, unjust, violent, blind, scandalous."

Such a discourse should have affected me, but not at all. On leaving the officer I told him for politeness' sake that I would gradually stop going there, but I had no intention of doing so. When I asked him how he had learned that I went to Nina's, he answered with a smile that it was the talk of every coffeehouse. That same evening I went to her house, and I told her nothing about it. I still cannot understand it, for I was neither in love with her nor curious about her.

On November 14 I arrive at her house at the usual hour, and I see a man who is showing her miniatures; I look at him, and I see the infamous scoundrel Passano, or Pogomas.[9] The blood rushes to my head, but I control myself. I take Nina by the hand, I lead her into the next room, I tell her to send the vile creature away at once or I will leave at once and never return there in all my life.

"He is a painter."

"I know that, I am acquainted with him, I will tell you everything afterward, send him away now, or I will leave."

She calls her sister and tells her to dismiss the painter at once and tell him not to set foot in her house again. It was done instantly; her sister told us that when he left he had said that I would repent of it. I spent an hour telling her most of the grounds for complaint which I had against the monster.

The next day, November 15, I go to her house at the usual time, and I spend the two hours in the gayest conversation, Schizza's wife being always present. Midnight strikes, I leave. The door of her house was under the arcade which continued to the end of the street. I have scarcely gone twenty paces under the arcade, the night being very dark, when I am attacked by two men. I give a great leap back, I unsheathe my sword, shouting "Murder!" and thrusting it into the nearest body, after which I jump out of the arcade into the middle of the street across the low wall which bounded it. At the same time I hear the report of a gun or a pistol, I run, I fall, I rise without troubling to pick up my hat, and, still running and holding my naked sword in my hand, not knowing if I was wounded, I arrive at my inn breathless, I lay my sword, stained with blood up to the middle, on the counter, ordering the innkeeper to take charge of it. I tell the good old man all that has just happened to me, and at the same time I am relieved to find that the gun shot or pistol shot had missed me; but I find two unmistakable holes in my greatcoat, below the armpit.

"I am going to bed," I said to him, "and I leave you my greatcoat too. Tomorrow morning you shall come to the magistrate with me as my witness, to lay a charge of murder, for if a man has been killed it will be seen that I did it only to defend my life."

"I think you would do better to leave at once."

"Then you do not believe the thing happened as I have told you it did?"

"I believe every word of it; but leave, for I see from where the blow has come, and God knows what will happen to you."

"Nothing will happen to me. If I left, I should be pronounced guilty. Take care of my sword and my cloak. There has been an attempt to murder me. It is for the murderers to be afraid."

I go up to bed, and at seven o'clock in the morning I hear a knock on my door. I open it, and a police officer enters with the innkeeper.

"Give me all your papers," he says, "dress, and come with me. If you resist I will send downstairs for my men."

"By whose order have you come to demand my papers?"

"By order of the Government. They will be returned to you if there is nothing to prevent their being returned to you."

"And where am I to go with you?"

"To the Citadel, where you will be under arrest."

I open my trunk, and the man is astonished to see that it was at least two-thirds filled with notebooks. I take out my coats and my shirts, which I entrust to the innkeeper, and I leave him my trunk, giving him the keys to it. The officer tells me to pack a portmanteau with what I may need for the night, and he orders the innkeeper to send me a bed. He asks me if I have any papers in my pockets, and I say I have not, showing him that I have only my passports. He says with a bitter smile that it is above all my passports that he wants.

"My passports are sacred; I will give them to no one but the Governor-General, or you shall take my life. Respect your King: here is his passport, here is the Count of Aranda's, and here is the Venetian Ambassador's. They order you to respect me. You shall not have them until you have tied me hand and foot."

"Calm yourself. When you give them to me it is as if you gave them to His Excellency, and if you resist I will not have you tied hand and foot, but I will have you taken to the Palace,[10] where you will be obliged to hand them over in public. Give them to me, and I will write you a receipt."

The innkeeper told me that I would do better to yield, that I risked nothing, and that my passports could only speak in my favor, and I was persuaded. He wrote me a receipt, which I put in my portfolio, which he was kind enough to let me keep, and I left the inn with him, being followed by six constables, but at a distance. Remembering Madrid, I thought I was being treated humanely. The officer having told me that I could order the innkeeper to send me food, I told him to send me dinner and supper. He lent me an overcoat, for I did not want mine with two bullet holes in it, and on the way I told the police officer all that had happened to me at midnight. He listened attentively, never answering a word.

At the Citadel he turned me over to a military officer, who put me in a second-floor room without furniture, whose ungrated windows looked out on the square. A soldier locked me into it. A moment later a soldier brought me my night bag, and a quarter of an hour later I was brought an excellent bed with a coverlet of crimson damask and two others, for on the 16th of November the cold was beginning to be felt. Left alone, I gave myself to reflection.

''What sort of prison is this? What can it have to do with what happened to me at midnight? Nothing. My papers are to be examined, for reasons which, being completely innocent, I cannot guess, and I am put in a decent prison until they have been examined. So far so good. The attack on me is another matter. Even if the man I wounded has died, I have nothing to fear. The innkeeper's advice shows me that I have everything to fear if the cutthroats were ordered to kill me by someone who has unlimited power. He is right, but I must not suppose that. Should I have done well to take his advice and leave at once? No, because after such an incident I might have been followed, caught, and put in a far worse prison. This one is extremely mild. It will take only three or four days to examine my papers; I shall be freed, and they will be returned to me. My passports will be seen, and they will show that I am to be treated with respect. The attempt on my life cannot have come from a tyrannical order on the part of the only man who can give such an order in Barcelona, for he would not now be treating me so mildly. If the order came from him, he must have been informed at once that the attempt failed, and having me arrested was not the expedient to which he would best have resorted this morning. Should I write to Nina? Is one allowed to write here?''

Thus rehearsing a hundred arguments, lying on my bed, for I had not a single chair, and being able to reach no conclusion, I hear a noise outside and I open the window to see what it is. To my great surprise I see the scoundrel Passano conducted by a corporal and two soldiers into a room on the ground floor twenty paces from where I was. As he entered it the knave raised his eyes, and, seeing me, he laughed. This sudden apparition left me completely at a loss. Now I understood nothing. ''He told Nina's sister that I would repent. He must have made some slanderous accusation against me, and he is apparently being put in prison to testify to it.'' It was all that I could suppose.

I was brought a choice dinner, and the soldier, persuaded by a peso duro, which is worth exactly a hundred French sous, had a table and chair brought me. The same soldier brought me as much paper and as many pencils as I wanted; it was forbidden to bring pen and ink without the officer's permission. He also brought me candles and a candlestick; I passed my time making geometrical calculations. I had him sup with me, and he promised to speak well of me the next day to a soldier who was a friend of his and who would serve me faithfully. The guard was changed at eleven o'clock. My prison was mild; it cost me a great deal; but I had nearly three hundred doblones in my purse. I consoled myself by thinking that it would all be over at any moment. On the morning of the fourth day an officer enters my room and tells me sadly that he brings bad news.

''I did not expect it in this place. What now, Señor?''

''I am ordered to put you in the Tower.'' [11]

''Me?''

"None other."

"Then I have been found to be a great criminal. Let us go, Señor."

He orders two soldiers to carry everything I had there to the Tower, and two others and a corporal conduct me to the Tower, which was a hundred paces from where I was. It was raining in torrents. I see a round cell, a sort of cellar paved with stone, with four or five slits high up and two inches wide, through which came a sufficiency of light. The officer said that I had only to order what I wanted to eat once a day, for at night no one was allowed to have his cell opened. I think he called it a calabozo.[12]

"Who will bring me lights?"

"Keep an oil lamp always burning, and that will suffice you, for books are not allowed here. When you are brought your dinner, the officer on duty will come to open the pasty or the fowl, for there might be letters in them; and here it is permitted neither to write nor to receive letters."

"Were you given these orders expressly for me?"

"No, these are the customary regulations here. You will have a sentinel always in sight at your door, to whom you may talk."

"Then the door will be open?"

"Certainly not."

"And cleanliness?"

"The officer who will have dinner brought to you will come up with a soldier who for a trifle will make your bed and take away anything that may inconvenience you."

"May I make architectural plans with a pencil?"

"As many as you please."

"Then order paper brought me. Here is some money."

"I can do you the favor. I will tell the officer who will go on guard duty."

When he saw that I had everything there which had been in the room in the barracks, he went away sadly, trying to encourage me and advising me to be patient, as if I could have been anything else. He shut the heavy door himself, and through a square, grated window ten inches wide I saw a soldier standing guard.

The officer who came at noon brought me paper and cut up a fowl for me. He put the fork into the dishes in which there were ragouts to see if there were letters at the bottom of them. There was food enough for six. I told him that he would do me honor if he would dine with me; he replied that it was absolutely forbidden, and he made the same reply when I asked him for the newspaper. The lucky soldiers were my guards, for I gave them food and excellent wine. I was very curious to know if I was living at my own expense, or if it was Nina who was paying; but that was impossible, for the waiter from the inn had to leave my dinner at the guardhouse.

It was there that in forty-two days I wrote in pencil and without books my entire confutation[13] of the History of the Government of Venice written by Amelot de la Houssaye,[14] putting off quoting from it until, restored to freedom, I could work with the author I was refuting under my eyes. What surprised me one day, and almost made me laugh, was the soldier whom I saw on guard duty at my door. The thing seemed to me impossible. Here is the story

An Italian named Tadini[15] came to Warsaw while I was there, with letters of recommendation to Tomatis and to me. He said that he was an oculist. The person who recommended him to me was an actress in Dresden, who recommended him as such. Tomatis sometimes gave him dinner; not being rich, I could only give him kind words and a cup of coffee when he came at my breakfast time. He talked to everyone about his operations; he denigrated the oculist who had been established in Warsaw for twenty years, saying that he did not know how to remove a cataract, and the other countered by calling him a charlatan who did not know how the eye was constructed. Tadini asked me to speak in his favor to a lady whose cataract, which the other had removed, had recurred; she was blind in the eye which had been operated on and which was again covered over; but she saw all that she needed to see with the other. I told Tadini that I would have no part in the matter. He told me that he had spoken to her, and that he had mentioned me as someone who could vouch for him.

"You did very wrong, for in that respect I would not vouch for the most learned of men, and I know nothing about you. In your profession you should need no one's recommendation; you should cry aloud operibus credite ['let my works bear witness'].[16] That should be your motto."

Tadini, put out by my argument, shows me a quantity of testimonials which I might have read if the first one he handed me had not been from a person who bore witness urbi et orbi ("to the city and the world")[17] that Signor Tadini had cured him of gutta serena.[18] I laugh, and I ask him to leave. Some days later I find him dining with me at the house of the lady whose left eye was covered by a large cataract. I am cordial to him, and I let him talk his fill, but intending to find an opportunity to warn the lady not to trust him. I saw that she had almost resolved to have the cataract removed; but since he had mentioned me she wanted me to be present beforehand at a discussion between him and the other oculist, who arrived at dessert. It was then that I prepared to listen with great pleasure to the argument between the two professors. The old oculist, who was German but who spoke French well, attacked Tadini in Latin. Tadini stopped him by saying that the lady should be able to understand what they were saying, and I said that Tadini was right. Tadini did not understand a word of Latin.

The German oculist began reasonably enough by saying it was true that removing the cataract assured the doctor and the patient that it would not return, but that the operation was less certain and, in addition, might leave the patient blind even so, because of the irreparable loss of the crystalline humor. Tadini, instead of denying this, for the German was wrong, was stupid enough to take from his pocket a small box in which were small round objects which looked like lenses; they were highly polished and made of very pure crystal.

"What are they?" the old oculist asked.

"They are what I possess the skill to put under the cornea to replace the crystalline lens."

At that the German burst into laughter so loud, so long, and so often repeated that the lady could not but do likewise. For my part, ashamed to be thought the sponsor of so stupid a beast, I looked at him sadly, saying nothing. Tadini, taking my silence as proof that I was persuaded that the German had no reason to laugh at him, thought he could retrieve the situation by calling on me to give my opinion.

"My opinion is that, the difference between a tooth and the crystalline lens being very great, you are wrong to believe that one can replace the crystalline lens in the eye between the retina and the vitreous humor as you have perhaps placed a false tooth in a jaw."

"Sir, I have never replaced anyone's teeth."

So saying, the unmannerly brute rises and leaves. We continued to laugh, and the lady was thoroughly determined to see no more of the dangerous man; but the oculist was not satisfied with despising the impostor in silence, he thought him a danger; he had him summoned before the medical faculty to take an examination in his knowledge of the structure of the eye, and he printed in the gazette a humorous article on inserting the crystalline lens into the eye between the cornea and the retina, naming the wonderful artist who was then in Warsaw and who performed the operation as easily as a dentist replaced a tooth. The desperate Tadini waited for the oculist I forget where, and, sword in hand, forced him to take refuge in a house. He must have left on foot the same day, for he did not return to the room in which he was lodging.

So what a surprise it was, and how I wanted to laugh, when, going to the little window of the calabozo, where I was dying of boredom, I saw the oculist Tadini, dressed in white, with a bayonet fixed to the muzzle of his gun! I have never decided which of us should have been the more surprised—whether I seeing the oculist as the sentry at the door of my cell, or he seeing me in the depths of a tower and in a way under his guard. The fact is that he was thunderstruck when, despite the darkness, he recognized me, and that he felt no desire to laugh, whereas I did nothing but laugh during the whole of the two hours he stayed there. I gave him a good dinner and good wine and an écu, promising that I would do as much for him each time he came to guard me, but I had him only four times, for there were intrigues to be posted at my door in the daytime. Tadini amused me by telling me of all the misfortunes which had befallen him during the three years since we had seen each other in Warsaw. He had been to Cracow, Vienna, Munich, Strassburg, Paris, Toulouse, and finally to Barcelona, where the Catalan laws[19] had shown no mercy on his qualifications as an oculist. Having no recommendations, nor a diploma from any university to testify to his knowledge of the eye, and having refused to take an examination which was to be given in Latin, for the Latin language had nothing to do with diseases of the eye, he was not allowed simply to go elsewhere a free man, he was made a soldier. He confided to me that he would desert at the first opportunity. He consoled me by saying that since Warsaw he had said no more about his crystalline lenses, though he felt certain that they would succeed; he was convinced of it; and he had not performed the experiment, which, despite the lack of arguments for it, was absolutely necessary. I never learned what became of the poor fellow.

On December 28, the Feast of the Holy Innocents,[20] exactly six weeks after the day I was imprisoned, the officer on duty entered my cell and told me to dress and go with him.

"Am I to be released?"

"I know nothing about it. I shall deliver you to an official of the Government, who is in the guardhouse."

I dress quickly, I put what I had in my portmanteau, I leave everything there, I follow him, he turns me over to the same officer who had brought me there, who takes me to the Palace, where a chancellery clerk shows me my trunk, gives me the keys to it, and tells me that all the papers which had been in it were there. After that he gives me my three passports, saying that they are authentic.

"I know that, and I knew it."

"There were strong reasons for believing the contrary. Look at this."

He shows me a document from Madrid, dated December 23 and signed by a name which I do not remember, certifying the authenticity of my three passports. I read it,[21] I hand it back to him, and I thank him. He goes on as follows:

"Vuestra Señoría[22] is justified so far as the passports are concerned. I am ordered to tell you that you must leave Barcelona in three days, and the Principality of Catalonia in eight. However, you are at liberty to go to Madrid to complain at the Court, if you think you have grounds for complaint."

"Señor, I shall go to France. Will you be so good as to give me in writing the order you have just conveyed to me?"

"That is not necessary. My name is Manuel Badillo,[23] Secretary to the Government. Señor ...... here will escort you to the 'Santa Maria' and to the same room from which he took you. You will find everything there that you left there, and everything you have left in the Tower. You are free. Good-by, Señor. Tomorrow I will send you a passport signed by His Excellency and myself.''

I return to the officer dressed in blue the receipt for my passports, and, followed by a manservant carrying my trunk, we go to the ''Santa Maria.'' On the way I see a placard announcing the opera for that evening, and I look forward with pleasure to attending it.

The host of the ''Santa Maria'' is glad to see me, he has a fire lighted for me at once, for an unusually strong north wind was chilling the air, he assures me that no one has entered my room except himself, and in the officer's presence he gives me back my naked sword, but from which the blood had been cleaned, and my greatcoat. What surprises me is the hat I had lost when I fell during my escape. The other officer, after seeing that everything I had had in the Tower had been brought, asks me if I acknowledge that all my belongings have been returned to me. I reply that I am sure of it.

''Señor, I wish you good day, and a good journey, whether to France or to Madrid.''

That, my dear reader, is the whole of the strange story of what befell me in Barcelona; you have never read anything more true, or more faithfully narrated, and it is known in all its circumstances to a number of people who still live in that city, all of them worthy of credit. Here is what followed.

I tell the innkeeper that I will dine at noon, and I go out with the same manservant with whom Nina had furnished me. I go to the post office to see if I shall find the letters which must have been sent to me marked poste restante, and I find five or six. Yet another surprise: the same Government which summarily seizes a man's person and all his papers does not permit itself to remove the letters addressed to him from the post office. The letters were all dated long before, from Paris, Venice, Warsaw, and Madrid. I had no reason to suppose that a single letter to me had been intercepted.

I go back to the inn to read my letters at my ease and to have a talk with the innkeeper which I expected would be of great interest to me. The first thing for which I ask him is my reckoning, and he replies that I owe him nothing. He shows me the whole account from before my imprisonment duly paid, and he tells me that he had been instructed by the same emissary to take nothing from me for anything he would supply me with in prison and, after that, until I left Barcelona.

"Then you knew how long I was to remain in the Tower?"

"I never knew anything. I was paid at the end of every week."

"At whose behest?"

"You know."

"Have you received any notes for me?"

"None."

"And the manservant?"

"I paid him and dismissed him; at present I have no orders in that respect."

"I want him to accompany me as far as Perpignan."

"I believe you are doing well to leave Spain, for in Madrid you will not obtain justice."

"What was said about the attempt on my life?"

"They said that the shot which was heard was fired by you; and that it must have been you who bloodied your sword, for no one was found either killed or wounded."

"That's as amusing as it is extraordinary. And my hat?"

"It was sent to me three days later; I sent everything to the Government, together with your sword and your greatcoat, on the morning of your arrest, as you ordered me to do."

"What an imbroglio! But was it known that I was in the Tower?"

"The whole town knew it. But two good reasons were given for it; one publicly, and the other was whispered about. The public one was that your passports were forged. The secret one, which, if you ask me, was the true one, was that you spent your nights at Nina's. I swore to everyone that you had never spent a night away; but that makes no difference. You went there. However, as it turns out, you did well not to leave when I tried to persuade you to go, for now you are justified in every respect."

"I shall go to the opera this evening, but not in the parterre. See to engaging me a box."

"I will do so. I hope you will not go to La Nina's."

"I shall not, that is certain."

Toward noon a young man, a banker's clerk, brought me a letter which gave me a fresh surprise. I open it, and I find the bills of exchange which I had drawn in Genoa in favor of Signor Agostino Grimaldi della Pietra.[24] His letter was short. Here is a translation of it, which I make from the original today:

"Passano is vainly trying to persuade me to send these bills to Barcelona to get you arrested. I send them to you as a present, and to convince you that I am not a man to increase the troubles of those whom Fortune persecutes. Genoa, this 30th November 1768."

Here was the fourth Genoese[25] whose conduct toward me had been truly heroic. Must I, I asked myself, for the sake of four such men of honor, forgive the Genoese Passano? Certainly not. I must deliver them from such an unworthy fellow countryman. But my wish to do so came to nothing. I learned some years later that the monster died in poverty in Genoa. But Signor Grimaldi's letter gave me urgent reason to find out where Passano was then. He had remained a prisoner in the barracks when I was taken to the Tower; I had to know where he was, either to attempt to crush him if he was in a position to harm me, or, having such a cutthroat as my enemy, to be on my guard. I confided my concern to the innkeeper, who ordered my manservant to make inquiries. Here is what I learned before I left Barcelona, though I could never learn more.

Ascanio Pogomas, for so he called himself, had been set free toward the end of November and had left by sea on a ship which sailed for Toulon three or four days after his release from the Citadel. On the same day I wrote Signor Grimaldi a four-page letter in which he must have found the quintessence of gratitude. It was a matter of so couching my thanks that they would pay him for a thousand zecchini[26] which I acknowledged that I owed him by my two bills, with which, if he had done what the monster told him to do, he would have caused me great distress.

But now for another piece of news which set Barcelona talking.

Two hours after noon all the placards advertising the opera for that evening were changed. The new placards announced that the theater would be closed until the day after New Year's because two of the leading actors were ill. Such an order could only come directly from the Viceroy, for everyone still called him so, saying that Catalonia was a Kingdom, not a Principality.[27] I said nothing, but I laid the suspension to my door. My character being what it is, I made a resolve of which I thought myself incapable: I resolved not to go out. It was a way to make the Count of Ricla blush for his tyranny, to reproach him for his blindness and the iniquities into which he had been driven by the unfortunate love which had reduced him to becoming the most unjust of men whereas before he was considered the justest. Petrarch says:

> Amor che fa gentile un cor vilano
> ("Love which makes a base heart > gentle").[28]

Love had done the opposite to Ricla, whom it had found a decent man.

Nor did I write to the infamous Nina, whose black soul I had recognized on the first day I had made her acquaintance in Valencia. I left her free to boast that she had kept me. It was none the less true that she had worked my ruin and deliberately brought me to the verge of an abyss which was to have cost me my life. My reader will learn more about this dark business four months hence.

I should have left the same day, but for a superstitious fancy on my part. I wanted my departure from Spain to take place on the last day of the unlucky year that I had spent there. I devoted the whole of the three days to writing some thirty letters to all my most valued friends and acquaintances. Don Miguel de Cevaillos, Don Diego de la Secada, and the Count of Peralada all came to see me, but without meeting one another. Señor de la Secada was the uncle of the Countess A B [29] whom I had known in Milan. The three noblemen all related to me a most remarkable and singular circumstance, as are all the others which enter into the story I am telling. On the 26th of the same month, that is, two days before I was released from prison, the Abate Marchisio,[30] Envoy from the Duke of Modena, asked the Count of Ricla, in the presence of several people, if he could visit me to give me a letter which he could deliver into no hands but mine, which he regretted, for he had to leave for Madrid the next morning. Everyone was astonished that the Count made no reply to the Abate, who did in fact leave the next morning, the day before my release. I wrote to the Abate, whom I did not know, in Madrid, and I received no answer. I was never able to learn what the letter was which he had to deliver to me personally.

Everything in this affair being mysterious and inconceivable, it follows that I was involved in it only because of the despotism of the jealous Count Ricla, whom the infamous Nina had amused herself by convincing that I was in love with her and that she granted me her favors. Sending my passports to Madrid was nothing but a pretext, for in a week or ten days they could have been sent there and returned, supposing that someone had accused me of having forged them. It might have been a calumny on the part of Pogomas, supposing that he had learned that I had a passport from the King of Spain, which I could never have had without first having one from the Venetian Ambassador. The wretch might have said that I could not possibly have such a passport since I was in disfavor with the State Inquisitors. Despite his notion and his conclusion from it, I had nevertheless obtained one, and in the following fashion:

Having resolved at the end of August to leave my charming Doña Ignacia and Madrid for ever, I applied for a passport to the Count of Aranda, who answered me that, since he was bound by the regulations, he could not give it to me until I had first received a passport from the Venetian Ambassador; he said that the Ambassador could not refuse it to me. Satisfied with this decision, I go to the residence of the Ambassador, Signor Querini, who was then at San Ildefonso.[31] I tell the porter that I need to speak to Signor Olivieri,[32] the Secretary of Embassy; he announces me, and the idiot takes it on himself not to receive me. I write him the next day that I had not gone to Signor Querini's residence to pay court to him, the Secretary, but to demand a passport which he could not refuse me. I write him my name, and the very insignificant title of Doctor of Law, which he could not refuse me, and I ask him to leave it with the porter, to whom I would go for it the next day. The next day the porter tells me by word of mouth that the Ambassador had left an order that I was not to be given a passport.

It was then that I wrote to the Marchese Grimaldi[33] at San Ildefonso, and at the same time to the Duke of Losada, asking them both to tell the Venetian Ambassador to send me a passport, for, failing that, I should make public the shameful means which his uncle the Ambassador[34] had adopted to disgrace me. I do not know if the Duke and the Marchese showed my letter to the Ambassador, Querini, but I know that Secretary Olivieri sent me the passport, which Doña Ignacia put into my hands. I read the passport, and I see my name without any title at all, a thing which is noticed in Spain, for only a servant is refused the Don, as we refuse him the Signor and the French the Monsieur, while I was accorded only the Sieur. Burning with anger at this mark of contempt, I wrote a letter to Don Domingo Varnier, who, being on duty, was then at Court, and I send him my diploma as a Prothonotary[35] in which I am styled Cavaliere of the Golden Spur and Doctor of Law. In addition I send him the offending passport, and I ask him to convey my letter and my complaint to the Marchese Grimaldi if the Ambassador continued to insult me. Three days later he sent me back my diploma, saying that he had not needed to speak to the Minister, for the Ambassador had been convinced as soon as he saw my titles, of which he had not known before. He ended his letter by saying that the Secretary of Embassy would send me such a passport as I had a right to demand, whereupon it would rest with me to obtain one from the King through the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The next day I received the passport in the form in which I wanted it; I sent it to Don Varnier in San Ildefonso, who sent it back to me with the King's, signed by the Marchese Grimaldo de' Grimaldi,[36] which enabled me to obtain a passport from the Count of Aranda, who, when I told him the story, deigned to smile. Correspondence between Madrid and the Court when it is at one of the three Sitios[37] costs nothing. It is all at the King's expense. The organization, or the regulation, of the letter post is also different from what I have found all over Europe. Everyone can write letters to any country in the world and drop them in the public box without paying a copper; the letters are sent with the greatest punctuality; but one pays very high to obtain the answers from the post office. An answer from Petersburg costs a ducat. If the person to whom it is sent leaves it there, lacking the ducat or from parsimony, he cannot obtain one from Cadiz which would cost him only ten sous. If he goes to ask for it, he is refused it unless he also takes all the other letters addressed to him. The same thing is done in Naples.

On the last day of the year I left Barcelona, with my manservant sitting behind my barouche. I had contracted to reach Perpignan by short stages on the third day of the year 1769. My coachman was a Piedmontese. Perpignan is forty short leagues from Barcelona.[38] The next day at the inn where I dined the coachman came in with my servant and asked me if I had any reason to suspect that I was being followed.

"It is possible. Why do you ask?"

"There are three villainous-looking men, on foot and armed, whom I noticed yesterday when we left Barcelona, who spent last night in the stable of the inn where we lodged, who ate here today, and who left three quarters of an hour ago. They talk to no one, they strike me as being shady characters."

"What can we do to protect ourselves from being murdered, or to free ourselves from a suspicion which troubles me?"

"Set out late and stop at an inn I know a league this side of the usual stopping place, to which the fellows will have gone to wait for us. If I see them coming back to lodge in the poor inn at which we shall be, I shall have no more doubt; they are cutthroats bent on harming us."

I find his reasoning sound. I leave later, I travel most of the way on foot, and at five o'clock we stop where we find very poor accommodations but where we do not see[39] their three faces. At eight o'clock, when I was supping, my servant comes in and tells me that the three cutthroats are in the stable, where they are drinking with our coachman. My hair stands on end at the news, for there was no more doubt. We had nothing to fear at the inn, but very much to fear at the border, which we were to reach that evening. I urge my servant to show no sign, and to arrange for the coachman to come to speak to me when the fellows fall asleep. It was at ten o'clock that the coachman came; he told me point-blank that the men would murder us as soon as we got to the French border.

"After drinking a bottle at my expense," he said, "one of them asked me why I had not gone to the other post station, where we should have been better lodged, and I replied that you were cold and that it was late. I could have asked them why they did not stop there themselves, and where they are going, but I took good care not to. I only asked them if the road to Perpignan was good, and they answered that it is excellent and that one is not even aware that one is crossing the Pyrenees. They are asleep on bales of straw, wrapped in their cloaks, near my mules. We will leave before daybreak; but after them, of course, and we will dine at the usual stopping place; but after dinner, if you will trust me, we will leave after them, and I will drive at a trot by another road, and we shall be in France at midnight. I am sure of what I say."

If I could have engaged an escort of four armed men I should not have taken the coachman's advice; but in the situation I was in I had to do as he said. We found the three bravoes where the driver had told me they would be, and as we went downstairs I had glanced at them. They looked what they were. They left a quarter of an hour later, and a half hour after them my worthy coachman drove back for a quarter of a league, then hired a peasant to guide him, who got up behind to tell him if he went wrong. We made eleven leagues in seven hours; it was ten o'clock when we arrived at a good inn in a considerable village in France, where we had nothing more to fear. I slept well and dined there the next day, and that evening I was at the post house inn in Perpignan, sure that I had saved my life and that I owed it to my coachman. I could not guess from where the order to murder me might have come; but the reader will see how I learned everything three weeks later. At Perpignan I dismissed my manservant, whom I recompensed liberally, and I wrote my brother in Paris my good luck in escaping from the plots of three cutthroats. I told him to answer me at Aix-en-Provence, poste restante, where I should spend two weeks in order to see the Marquis d'Argens,[40] who ought to be there.

The next day I slept at Narbonne, and on the day after that at Béziers. From Narbonne to Béziers is only five leagues; but the excellent dishes which the most amiable of all hostesses had had prepared for me at dinner persuaded me to sup there with her and her whole family. Béziers was a city whose delightful situation was apparent despite the season. Fortunate site, a fit retreat for a philosopher who had renounced all the vanities of the world, and no less so for a voluptuary who wanted to enjoy all the pleasures of the senses without having to be very rich. The inhabitants of the place are all intelligent, the women are extremely beautiful, and the cuisine is as exquisite for flesh food as it is for fish. One drinks excellent wines, which the accursed vintners have not tampered with. I spent the next day in Pézenas, and on the day after that I arrived in Montpellier, going to lodge at the "White Horse,"[41] where I intended to spend a week.

It was there that I left my coachman, giving him a gratuity of a doblón de a ocho, which encouraged him to remain an honest man. I supped at the public table, where there were as many made dishes as guests. Nowhere in France does one eat better than in Montpellier. The next morning I went to breakfast at a coffeehouse, where I struck up an acquaintance with a stranger who, when he heard me say that I wanted to meet some professors,[42] himself took me to the house of one who enjoyed a considerable reputation and who had the urbanity which the man of letters in France rightly believes to be the finest jewel in Apollo's[43] crown. The true man of letters must be the friend of all who love letters, and he is so in France even more than in Italy; in Germany he is mysterious and reserved; he is too much inclined to think he must assert no pretensions, and because of this mistaken idea he does not gain the friendship of those who go to admire him at close range and to imbibe his doctrine.

I am told that the troupe of actors is very good; I go, and I find it so. I breathed again, finding myself in France after so many misfortunes had assailed me in Spain; I seemed to be reborn, and in fact I felt rejuvenated. I congratulated myself that at the play I had seen several very pretty girls and not one of them had roused desires in me. I wanted to find La Castel-Bajac,[44] more in the hope of rejoicing in her prosperous state than to renew a liaison which, if she had become reconciled with her husband, I thought criminal. I did not know how to go about finding her. I had written to her under the name of Mademoiselle Blasin; but that was not her name; she had always refused to tell me it. By making particular inquiries I feared I should be indiscreet and do her harm. Knowing that her husband must be an apothecary, I decided to become acquainted with them all; in this way I found her on the third day. I talked with all of them about the different practice of pharmacy in foreign countries, and as soon as I had reason to suppose that the one with whom I was speaking might be her husband I left, hoping that he would tell his wife about the traveler whom she might have known; I was sure that she could not but be curious about him. When the apothecary was not in his shop, I at once learned all his family affairs from the shopboy, and if the circumstances did not fit my case I went to another shop.

In this way I found her. On the third day I received a note from her, saying that she had seen me talking with her husband in a shop which she named. She told me to return there at such-and-such an hour and to be guided in my replies by her husband's questions, never telling him anything more than that I had known her under the name of Mademoiselle Blasin, and always as a seller of laces, in England, at Spa, at Leipzig, at Vienna, and that I had taken an interest in her in the last of those cities only to procure her the protection of the Ambassador.[45] She ended her note by saying that her husband himself would have the pleasure of surprising me by presenting his wife to me.

I followed her instructions. I went to his shop immediately after dinner, and the good man asked me if I had anywhere known a young seller of laces from Montpellier by the name of Blasin.

"Yes, but I do not know if she was from Montpellier. Pretty, well-behaved, and doing a good business. I saw her several times here and there in Europe, and in Vienna I was able to be of use to her. Her conduct gained her the affection and esteem of all the ladies with whom she had dealings. It was even at the house of a Duchess that I met her in England."

"Would you know her if you saw her?"

"Of course! Such a pretty woman! Is she in Montpellier? If she is, mention me to her. My name is So-and-so."

"You shall speak to her yourself."

He tells me to follow him upstairs, and he introduces me.

"What, Mademoiselle! You are here? I am delighted to see you again."

"Monsieur, she is not 'Mademoiselle'; she is my wife, by your leave, and I beg you not to let that keep you from kissing her."

"With great pleasure. So you found a husband in Montpellier! I congratulate you both, and I am grateful to Chance. Tell me if you had a good journey from Vienna to Lyons.''

She then began telling me everything she wanted to, and she found me as good an actor as herself. Our pleasure at seeing each other again was very great; but the pleasure the apothecary felt when he saw the respect with which I treated her was even greater. We conversed for an hour, in so natural a way that her husband never for a moment suspected that there had been a bond of love between us. She asked me if I thought of spending the Carnival in Montpellier, and she expressed regret when I told her that I should leave the next day. Her husband said that it could not be, to which she added that it should not be and that I absolutely must do her husband the ''honor'' of giving him two days so that I could come to their family dinner on the next day but one. After standing on ceremony for some time, I let myself be persuaded.

Instead of two days I gave them four. I dined and supped there. I thought her husband's mother as worthy of respect for her intelligence as for her age; like her son, she appeared to have forgotten everything which could prevent her from feeling all the affection for her daughter-in-law which the latter could ask. She told me herself, at times when we were alone, that she was happy, and if she said so she must have been so, for it is not possible in this world to be happy without feeling it. She never went out except to take the air with her mother, and she dearly loved her husband. During those four days I tasted the pure joy of true friendship, and the memory of the sweet life we had led together never once had the power to rekindle in us the desire to renew it. We did not need to communicate our thoughts to each other in order to know them. On the day on which I dined with her she told me that if I needed fifty louis she knew where to find them, and I answered that she should keep them for some other time when I should have the pleasure of seeing her again. I left Montpellier certain that my visit had increased the esteem which her husband and her mother-in-law felt for her. I congratulated myself that I could be happy without doing wrong.

On the day after I said good-by to one who owed me her happiness, I slept at Nîmes, where I spent three days with a most learned naturalist. He was Monsieur Séguier,[46] the intimate friend of the Marchese Maffei, of Verona, until his death. In the wonders of his collection he showed me the immensity of nature. Nîmes is a French city in which a stranger can profitably stay. There is excellent food for the mind in considerable monuments,[47] and for the heart in the fair sex. I was invited to a ball, where I enjoyed the privilege of a foreigner, a privilege unknown in Spain and Germany, where being a foreigner is counted against one.

On leaving Nîmes I decided to go to spend the whole of the Carnival at Aix, the seat of a Parlement,[48] where the nobility enjoys a distinguished reputation. I wanted to make the acquaintance of it. I lodged at the "Three Dolphins,"[49] if I am not mistaken; there I found a Spanish Cardinal who was on his way to Rome for the conclave to elect a Pope in place of Rezzonico.[50]

CHAPTER VI

My stay in Aix-en-Provence; serious illness; the unknown woman who takes care of me. The Marquis d'Argens. Cagliostro. My departure. Letter from Henriette. Marseilles. History of La Nina. Nice. Turin. Lugano. Madame de . . . .

MY ROOM being separated from His Eminence's only by a very thin partition, I heard him at supper severely reprimanding someone who must be his principal servant and in charge of their journey. The reason which provoked the Cardinal's just anger was that the man economized at dinner and supper as if his master were the poorest beggar in Spain.

"My Lord, I do not economize at all, but it is impossible to spend more, unless I make the innkeepers charge me twice the proper prices of the meals they give you, which you yourself declare to abound in everything you can want in the way of game, fish, and wines."

"That may be so, but with a little ingenuity you could send messengers ahead to order meals in places where I then would not stop, and which would be paid for nevertheless, you could have dishes prepared for twelve when we would only be six, and above all you could see to it that three tables are always served, one for us, one for my officers, and the third for my servants. I see here that you tip the postilions only twenty sous; I blush for it; in addition to what is prescribed for the guides, you must give at least an écu each time, and when you are given change from a louis you must leave it on the table. I have seen you put it in your pocket. That sort of thing is beggarly. It will be said at Versailles, at Madrid, at Rome—for everything becomes known—that Cardinal de la Cerda is a beggar or a miser. Understand that I am neither. Either stop dishonoring me, or leave."

Such is the character of the great Spanish nobleman; but, all in all, the Cardinal was right. I saw him set off the next day. What a man! Not only was he short, ill-built, tanned, but his face was so ugly and so common-looking that I understood his need to make himself respected by lavishness and to distinguish himself by his decorations, for otherwise he would have been taken for a groom. Any man who has a revolting exterior must do everything to keep the eyes which see him from examining his person. External ornaments are an excellent remedy for this sorry gift of nature. Display is the only weapon which the ugly command to fight beauty.

The next day I inquired for the Marquis d'Argens.[1] I was told that he was in the country, visiting his brother the Marquis d'Éguilles,[2] President of the Parlement; and I went there. The Marquis, famous rather for the unvarying friendship with which the late Frederick II [3] honored him than for his writings,[4] which no one reads any longer, was already old. Very voluptuous, a perfect gentleman, amusing, amiable, a determined Epicurean, he lived with the actress Cochois,[5] whom he had married and who had proved worthy of it. As a wife, she considered it her duty to be her husband's first servant. In any case, the Marquis d'Argens was deeply learned, thoroughly versed in Greek and Hebrew, endowed by nature with a most excellent memory, and hence full of erudition. He received me very well in consequence of what his friend Lord Marischal [6] had written to him, he at once presented me to his wife and to President d'Éguilles, his brother, an illustrious member of the Parlement of Aix, moderately rich, a lover of literature, whose virtuous life followed rather from his character than from his religion—which is saying a great deal, for he was sincerely devout, though a man of intelligence. A friend to the Jesuits to the point of himself being a Jesuit "of the short robe,"[7] as it is called, he dearly loved his brother, pitying him and hoping that efficacious grace would bring him back to the bosom of the Church. His brother smilingly encouraged him to hope, and they both took care not to offend each other by talking of religion. I was presented to the numerous company, which consisted of relatives, both men and women, all of them amiable and polished, as are all the Provençal nobility, which possesses these attributes in the highest degree. There was a small stage on which plays were performed, the fare was excellent, there were strolls in the garden despite the season. In Provence winter is unpleasant only when it is windy; unfortunately a north wind blows very often.

A lady from Berlin, the widow of a nephew of the Marquis d'Argens, was there with her brother, whose name was Gotzkowski.[8] Very young and very gay, he had thrown himself into all the pleasure afforded by the President's house, without paying any attention to all the religious devotions which were performed every day. A professed heretic when he happened to think of the Church, and playing the flute in his room when everyone in the house was attending the mass which the Jesuit confessor of the whole family celebrated every day, he laughed at everything; but the same was not true of the young widow his sister. Not only had she turned Catholic, she had become so devout that the whole household considered her a saint. It had been the Jesuit's doing. She was not more than twenty-two years of age. I learned from her brother that her husband, whom she adored, dying in her arms and lucid until his last moment, like all who die of consumption, had said to her, as his last words, that he could not hope to see her again in eternity unless she made up her mind to become a Catholic.

His words having thus been engraved in her memory, she had determined she would leave Berlin to visit her relatives on her late husband's side. No one had dared to oppose her wish. She persuaded her nineteen-year-old brother to accompany her, and, as soon as she was in Aix and her own mistress, she confided her vocation to her relatives, all of them devout believers. The disclosure had brought joy to the house; she was made much of, she was caressed, she was assured that there was no other way for her to see her husband again in body and in soul, the Jesuit had been able to ''proselytize'' her, as the Marquis d'Argens said to me, without needing to ''catechumenize'' her, for she had already been baptized and she had abjured. This budding saint was ugly. Her brother at once became my friend. It was he who, coming to Aix every day, introduced me at every house.

We were at least thirty at table. Excellent fare without profusion, the tone of good society, restrained and polished conversation which excluded not only equivocal allusions to the game of love but anything which could bring it to mind. I noticed that when such a remark escaped the Marquis d'Argens all the women made wry faces, and the father confessor quickly changed the subject. I should never have supposed that the man was either a Jesuit or a confessor, for, dressing as an abbé does in the country, he looked and acted neither part. The Marquis d'Argens had told me what he was. However, his presence in no way damped my natural gaiety. I told in decent terms the story of the image of the Blessed Virgin giving suck to the Infant Jesus, to which the Spaniards lost all their devotion when the scrupulous parish priest had her bosom covered by too opaque a veil.

I cannot explain what it was about the tone I gave my narrative which made all the ladies laugh. Their laughter so displeased the Jesuit that he took it upon himself to inform me that it was not permissible to tell stories in public which could bear an indecent interpretation. I thanked him by bowing, and the Marquis d'Argens, to change the subject, asked me what was the Italian name for a large force-meat pie which Madame d'Argens was serving and which the whole company declared excellent. I replied that we should call it una crostata, but that I did not know the name for the béatilles ("titbits") with which it was filled. They were little sausages, sweetbreads, mushrooms, artichoke hearts, fatted goose livers, and I know not what else. The Jesuit declared that by calling them béatilles I was making a mock of eternal bliss.[9] I could not keep from laughing loudly, and Monsieur d'Éguilles saw fit to come to my defense by saying that in good French béatilles was the generic term for all titbits of the sort.

Having thus differed from the director of his conscience, the Marquis wisely thought it best to talk of something else, and unfortunately he put the fat in the fire by asking me what Cardinal I thought would be made Pope.

"I would wager," I replied, "that it will be Father Ganganelli,[10] for he is the only Cardinal in the conclave who is a monk."

"By what necessity must it be a monk who is elected Pope?"

"Because only a monk is capable of committing the excess which Spain demands of the new Pontiff."

"You mean the suppression of the Jesuit order?"

"Exactly."

"Her demand will not be met."

"I hope so, for in the Jesuits I love my teachers; but I greatly fear it. I have seen a terrible letter. But aside from that, Cardinal Ganganelli will be Pope for a reason which will make you laugh but which is nevertheless very strong."

"What reason is that? Tell us, and we will laugh."

"He is the only Cardinal who doesn't wear a wig, and observe that since that Holy See has existed no Pope has ever worn a wig."

Since I said all this playfully, there was much laughter; but afterwards I was called on to speak seriously concerning the suppression of the order, and, when I repeated all that I had learned from the Abate Pinzi,[11] I saw the Jesuit turn pale.

"The Pope," he said, "cannot suppress the Jesuit order."

"Apparently, Abate, you did not study under the Jesuits, for their dictum is that the Pope can do everything, et aliquid pluris ['and somewhat more']."

Everyone thereupon thought that I did not know I was talking to a Jesuit; he did not answer me, and we spoke of other things. I was urged to stay for the performance of Polyeucte;[12] but I excused myself. I returned to Aix with Gotzkowski, who told me his sister's whole story and acquainted me with the characters of several members of Monsieur d'Éguilles's circle, with the result that I saw I could never adapt myself to it. But for this young man, who introduced me to some very agreeable people, I should have gone to Marseilles. Assemblies, suppers, balls, and very pretty girls made me spend the whole of the Carnival and part of Lent in Aix, always with Gotzkowski, who went back and forth from the country nearly every day to join me in parties of pleasure.

I had presented a copy of Homer's Iliad to Monsieur d'Argens, who knew Greek as well as he knew French, and an Argenis[13] in Latin to his adopted daughter,[14] who knew Latin. My Iliad had Porphyry's[15] scholia; it was a rare edition and very well bound. He had come to Aix to thank me, and I had to go again to dine in the country. Returning to Aix in an open chaise against a very strong north wind and without an overcoat, I arrived there chilled to the bone; and instead of going to bed I went with Gotzkowski to call on a woman who had a daughter fourteen years of age and beautiful as a star, who defied all the connoisseurs to make her see the light. Gotzkowski had tried the thing several times and had never succeeded; I laughed at him because I knew it was buffoonery[16] on the minx's part, and I went there with him that evening, determined to succeed, as I had done in England and at Metz. I believe I have written those two stories in their proper places.[17]

So we both set about the enterprise like seasoned warriors, the girl being at our disposal and, far from resisting, saying that she asked nothing better than that some man should rid her of her tiresome burden. Having at once seen that the difficulty we encountered came from her holding herself in a wrong posture, I should either have beaten her, as I had done to one of her sort in Venice twenty-five years earlier, or else have left; but not a bit of it, like a fool I determined to triumph over her by force, imagining that I was raping her. The age for exploits of that sort was long behind me. After vainly exhausting myself for two hours on end, I returned to my inn, leaving my friend there. I went to bed with a very severe pain in my right side, and after sleeping for six hours I woke feeling as ill as possible. Pleurisy had set in. An old physician who took care of me refused to bleed me. A violent cough began to torment me; the next morning I began spitting blood, and the disease made such strides in six or seven days that I confessed and received the last sacraments. It was on the tenth day, after I had been in a torpor for three, that the skillful old physician vouched for my life and assured all those who were concerned for me that I would recover; but I did not stop spitting blood until the eighteenth day. I then began a convalescence which lasted three weeks, and which I found more trying than the illness, for a sick person suffers but is not bored. To be bored without dôing anything takes intelligence, and an invalid has almost none. During the whole of this acute illness I was cared for and waited on day and night by a woman whom I neither knew nor had any idea who had sent her to me. In the state of apathy in which I was, I never tried to find out where she had come from; I saw that I was served to perfection, I waited to be cured in order to reward her and dismiss her. She was not old; but she was not of a figure to make me think of amusing myself; she had continued to sleep in my room until she saw that I was cured, and it was after Easter that, beginning to go out, I thought of paying her and sending her away.

When I dismissed her, well recompensed, I asked her who had sent her to nurse me, and she replied that it had been my physician. She left. Some days later I thanked the physician for having found me the woman, to whom I perhaps owed my life, and he replied that she had deceived me, for he did not know her. I asked the innkeeper's wife if she knew her, and she said she did not. No one could tell me either who the woman was or at whose instigation she had come to me. I did not learn it until I left Aix, and the reader will learn it in a quarter of an hour.

After my convalescence I did not fail to go to the post for my letters; and here is a strange piece of news which I learned by reading a letter from my brother, who wrote me from Paris in reply to the letter I had written him from Perpignan. He thanked me heartily for the letter I had written him because he had learned from it that I had not been murdered on the frontier of Catalonia.

"The person," he wrote me, "who gave me the fatal news as beyond doubt is one of your best friends, Count Manuzzi, an attaché at the Venetian Embassy."

Reading this revealed everything to me. My "best friend" had carried revenge so far as to hire three cutthroats to take my life. It was at that point that he made his first mistake. He was so sure of my death that he announced it as having already happened; if he had waited, he would have seen that, by announcing it before he was certain of it, he unmasked himself. When I came upon him in Rome two years later, and tried to convince him of his baseness, he denied everything, saying that he had received the news of it in Barcelona. But we will speak of that when we come to it.

The company at the public table being excellent, I dined and supped there every day. One day at dinner there was talk of a pair of pilgrims, a man and a woman, who had just arrived, who were Italians, who had come from Santiago de Compostela[18] on foot, and who must be persons of high rank, for, when they entered the city, they had distributed a great deal of money among the poor. The lady, we were told, was charming, only eighteen years of age; very tired, she had gone to bed at once. They were staying at our inn; we all became curious about them. As an Italian, it was for me to lead the band of us to visit the pair, who must be either fanatical zealots or rogues.

We find the female pilgrim sitting in an armchair, with the look of a person tired to exhaustion, and claiming our attention by her extreme youth, her beauty, which her melancholy increased, and a crucifix of some yellow metal, six inches long, which she held in her hands. She puts it down when we appear, and she rises to greet us graciously. The male pilgrim, who was fastening cockle shells[19] to his short cloak of black oiled cloth, does not stir; he seemed, glancing at his wife, to be telling us that we should be concerned only for her. He appeared to be five or six years older than she, he was short, well enough built, and his not unhandsome face expressed boldness, effrontery, cynicism, and deceit, in all which he differed entirely from his wife, whose countenance breathed nobility. The two strange creatures, who spoke

French only well enough to make themselves understood with difficulty, showed their relief when I spoke to them in Italian. She told me that she was a native of Rome, and she did not need to tell me so, for her pretty speech assured me of it; as for him, I put him down as a Sicilian, despite his telling me that he was from Naples. His passport, dated at Rome, gave his name as Balsamo;[20] hers was Serafina Feliciani, a name which she never changed. The reader will find Balsamo become Cagliostro ten years hence.

She told us that she was going back to Rome with her husband, glad to have made her devotions to St. James of Compostela and to Our Lady of the Pillar,[21] having gone there on foot and returned the same way, always living on alms, having vainly sought poverty in order to have and to gain more merit in the eyes of God, whom she had so greatly offended in her lifetime.

"It was in vain," she said to me, "that I never asked for more than a copper, I was always given silver and gold, so that, to fulfill our vow, whenever we entered a city we always had to give the poor all the money we had left, which, if we had kept it, would have made us guilty of failing to trust in Eternal Providence."

She told us that her husband, who was very strong, had not suffered, but that she had endured the greatest torments, having always to travel on foot and sleep in bad beds, almost always fully dressed for fear of contracting some skin disease of which it would prove very difficult to be cured.

It seemed to me likely that she mentioned this detail only to make us curious to see the cleanliness of her skin elsewhere than on her arms and hands, whose whiteness and perfect cleanliness she let us see gratis in the meanwhile. Her face had only one defect: her slightly rheumy eyelids marred the tenderness of her beautiful blue eyes. She told us that she intended to rest for three days and then leave for Rome, traveling by way of Turin to make her devotions at the adoration of the Most Holy Sudary.[22] She knew that there were several of them in Europe, but she had been assured that the true one was the one to be seen in Turin; it was the very cloth which St. Veronica had used to wipe the sweating[23] face of our Saviour, who had left the imprint of his divine countenance on it.

We left very well pleased with the pretty pilgrim, but doubting her devotion. As for me, still weak from my illness, I formed no designs on her; but all those who were with me would gladly have supped with her, if they had thought that her favors would await them afterward. The next morning the male pilgrim came to ask me if I would rather come up to breakfast with his wife and himself, or if they should come down; it would have been impolite to answer "Neither"; so I said I should be glad if they would come down. It was at this breakfast that, when I asked him what his profession was, the pilgrim replied that it was making drawings in ink in what is called "chiaroscuro." His ability consisted only in copying an engraving, and not at all in invention; but he assured me that he excelled in his art, for he could copy any engraving so accurately that he defied anyone to find the slightest difference between the copy and the original.

"I congratulate you. It is an admirable talent, with which, since you are not rich, you can earn a good living wherever you may be pleased to settle."

"Everyone tells me that, and everyone is mistaken. With my talent a man starves. Practicing my profession, I work a whole day in Naples and Rome, and I earn only a half a testone;[24] that is not a living."

After this explanation, he showed me some fans he had decorated, than which nothing could be more beautiful. It was done with ink, and they looked as if they were engraved. To convince me, he showed me the copy he had made from a Rembrandt,[25] which, if anything, was more beautiful than the original. Yet, excellent at his craft though he was, he swears to me that it does not bring him in enough to live; but I do not believe him. He was one of these lazy geniuses who prefer a vagabond life to hard work. I offer him a louis for one of his fans, and he refuses it, begging me to accept it gratis and to take up a collection for him at the public table, for he wanted to leave on the next day but one. I accepted his present, and I promised to make the collection for him.

I got together fifty or sixty écus for him, which his wife came to receive in person at the table, where we were still sitting. Far from acting immodestly, the young woman had an air of virtue. Invited to write down her name for a chance in a lottery, she excused herself, saying that in Rome girls who were brought up to be decent and virtuous were not taught to write. Everyone laughed, except myself, for, feeling sorry for her, I did not want to see her put to shame; but the thing made me certain that she must be a peasant.

It was she who, the next morning, came to my room to ask me for a letter of recommendation for Avignon, and I immediately wrote two for her, one to Monsieur Audifret, banker, the other to the proprietor of the "Saint-Omer" inn.[26] After supper that evening she gave me back the letter to Monsieur Audifret, saying that her husband had told her that he did not need it. At the same time she urges me to examine the letter she has returned and make sure that it is the one I had given her, and after looking at it I say there is no doubt that it is the same. At that she laughs and tells me I am mistaken, for it is only a copy. I refuse to admit it. She sends upstairs for her husband, who, with my letter in his hand, convinces me of the amazing imitation, which was much more difficult than copying an engraving. I expressed my admiration, saying that he could draw great profit from his talent; but that if he was not careful it could cost him his life.

The couple left the next day. The reader will learn at the proper time—which will be ten years hence—where and how I saw the man again, under the name of Count Pellegrini, with the good Serafina, his wife and his familiar spirit. As I write this, he is in prison, which he will never leave, and his wife is perhaps happy in a convent. I have heard that he is dead.[27]

As soon as my health was perfectly restored I went to take leave of the Marquis d'Argens at the house of President d'Éguilles. After dinner I spent three hours with the learned old man, who kept me well amused with countless anecdotes of the King of Prussia's private life, all of which would be new if I had the time and the wish to publish them. He was a monarch who had great qualities and great weaknesses, like nearly all great men; but the weaknesses were less in weight and in bulk. The King of Sweden who was assassinated [28] provoked hatred and then defied it to do its worst. He had the soul of a despot, and he had had to be one in order to satisfy his ruling passion, which was to get himself talked about and to be accounted a great man. His enemies all willingly risked death in order to deprive him of life. It would seem that he should have foreseen his fate, for his acts of oppression always drove his victims to desperation.

The Marquis d'Argens presented me with all his works.[29] When I asked him if I could really boast that I had them all, he said that I had, except the account of a period of his life which he had written in his youth[30] and allowed to be printed, and which he now regretted having written.

"Why?"

"Because with the mania of wanting to write the truth, I made myself eternally ridiculous. If the urge ever comes to you, resist it as you would a temptation; for I can assure you that you will repent, because as a gentleman you cannot write anything but the truth, and as an honest writer you are obliged not only not to leave anything that may have happened to you unrecorded, but also not to spare yourself in all the sins you have committed, while, as a sound philosopher, you must bring out all your good actions. You must blame and praise yourself by turns. All your confessions will be taken at face value, and you will not be believed when you tell truths which are to your credit. Besides all that, you will make enemies when you have to reveal secrets which will do no honor to the people who will have had dealings with you. If you do not give their names, they will be guessed, which comes to the same thing. Believe me, my friend, if a man may not talk about himself, still less may he write about himself. It is permitted only to a man whom slander forces to justify himself. Believe me: never think of writing your biography."

Convinced by his solid arguments, I promised him that I would never be guilty of that folly; nevertheless, I began my biography seven years ago, and by now I have promised myself that I will finish it, although I am already repentant. I write in the hope that my history will never be published; I flatter myself that in my last illness, grown wise at last, I will have all my notebooks burned in my presence. If that does not happen, the reader will forgive me when he learns that writing my memoirs was the only remedy I thought I could employ to keep from going mad or dying of chagrin over the vexations to which I was subjected by the scoundrels who inhabited Count Waldstein's castle[31] at Dux. By keeping myself busy writing ten or twelve hours a day, I have prevented black melancholy from killing me or driving me mad. We will speak of this when the time comes.[32]

On the day after Corpus Christi[33] I left Aix for Marseilles; but before leaving I must say something about the procession with which the feast is celebrated in every Catholic Christian city, but which at Aix-en-Provence has features so peculiar that any stranger whom they do not amaze must be a dolt. As everyone knows, at this procession the Being of Beings, displayed in body and spirit in the Eucharist and carried by the Bishop, is escorted by all the religious and secular confraternities. This is the case everywhere, and I will say no more about it. But what deserves to be observed and recorded, and what cannot but surprise, are the masquerades, the antics, and the buffoonery which are indulged in and performed. The Devil, Death, the Deadly Sins, most comically dressed, fighting one another in their rage at having to pay homage to the Creator on that day; the shouts, the catcalls, the booing of the populace deriding these personages, and the din of the songs with which the crowd mockingly hail them, playing all kinds of tricks on them, make up a spectacle far more unbridled than the Saturnalia[34] and than anything which we read was anywhere indulged in by the most frantic paganism. All the peasants from five or six leagues around are in Aix on that day to honor God. It is his feast day. God goes in procession only once a year; he has to be entertained, made to laugh on that day. This is implicitly believed, and anyone who should question it would be impious, for the Bishop, who cannot but be aware of what goes on, is himself the ringleader in it. Monsieur de Saint-Marc,[35] an important member of the Parlement, solemnly told me that it was excellent, for the day brought at least a hundred thousand francs into the city. Recognizing the cogency of his argument, I said not a word to the contrary.

During all the time I stayed in Aix, I constantly thought of Henriette.[36] Already knowing her real name, I had not forgotten the message she had sent me by Marcolina, and I was always expecting to find her at some gathering in Aix, at which I should have played toward her whatever role she wished. I several times heard her name spoken in different connections, but I took care not to question the person who had mentioned it, for fear of suggesting that I knew the lady. I always thought that she must be in the country; and, determined to pay her a visit, I had stayed on in Aix after my severe illness only in order to arrive at her house in perfect health. So I left Aix with a letter in my pocket in which I announced my arrival, intending to stop at the door of her country house, send it in to her, and not to get out of my carriage until she invited me to do so.

I had instructed the postilion accordingly. It was a league and a half before the Croix d'Or.[37] We arrive there. It was eleven o'clock. I give my letter to a man who had come to see what we wanted, and he tells me that he will send it to her.

"Madame is not here?"

"No, Monsieur. She is in Aix."

"Since when?"

"For the last six months."

"Where does she live in Aix?"

"In her town house. She will be here in three weeks to spend the summer, as she always does."

"Will you be so good as to let me write a letter?"

"You have only to get out, and I will open Madame's apartment for you. You will find everything you need there."

I get out, and no sooner have I entered the house than I am surprised to see the woman who had taken care of me during my illness.

"Do you live here?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"Since when?"

"For the past ten years."

"And how is it that you came to nurse me?"

"If you will go upstairs, I will go up too, and I will tell you the truth."

She told me that her mistress had sent for her and had ordered her to go to the inn in which I was lying ill, to enter my room boldly, and to take care of me as if it were of her own self, and that if I should ask who had sent her she should answer that it was the physician.

"What! The physician told me he had no idea who you are."

"He may have told you the truth, and he may have been ordered by Madame to answer you as I did. I know nothing more; but I am amazed that you did not see Madame in Aix."

"It is certain that she receives no one."

"You are right, but she goes everywhere."

"It is astonishing. I must have seen her, and I cannot understand how I can have failed to recognize her. You have been with her for ten years. Has she changed? Has she had some illness which has changed her features? Has she aged?"

"On the contrary. She has put on flesh. To see her, you would think she was a woman of thirty."

"I will write to her."

She leaves; and, astonished to the point of confusion by this extraordinary situation, I consider if I can, if I should, go to Aix at once, that very day. "She is at home; she receives no one; who can prevent her from receiving me? If she does not receive me, I will go away; but Henriette still loves me; she sent me a nurse; she is hurt by my not having recognized her; she knows that I have left Aix, she is sure that I am here at this moment, and she is waiting for the last act of the play to bring me to her house. Shall I go, or shall I write to her?"

I decide to write and to tell her that I will wait in Marseilles for her answer, to be addressed to me at the post office. I give my letter to my nurse, and money to send it at once by express messenger, and I go to dine in Marseilles. Not wanting to be known, I go to lodge at a poor inn, where I am very glad to see Signora Schizza, Nina's sister. She had arrived there from Barcelona with her husband three or four days before, and she was about to leave for Leghorn. She had dined, her husband was not there, I was extremely curious to learn a great many things, I asked her to come to talk with me in my room until my dinner was brought.

"What is your sister doing? Is she still in Barcelona?"

"My sister is still in Barcelona, but she will not stay there long, for the Bishop will not have her either in his city or in his diocese, and the Bishop is more powerful than Count Ricla. She returned from Valencia only as a woman who cannot be refused passage through Catalonia on her way back to Italy; but one does not stay nine or ten months in a city through which one is only passing. She will certainly leave within a month; but she is not sorry; for she is certain that the Count will keep her lavishly wherever she goes, and she may succeed in ruining him. Meanwhile she is well pleased to have ruined his reputation."

"I have some idea of the way her mind works, but after all she cannot be the enemy of a man who by now must already have made her rich."

"Not a bit of it. She has nothing but some diamonds. But do you suppose the monster can feel gratitude? Do you suppose she has human feelings? She is a perfect monster, and no one knows better than I that she is a monster because she cannot be anything else. She forced the Count to commit innumerable injustices for no other reason than that all Spain should talk about her and know that she has made herself the mistress of his body, his wealth, his soul, and his will. The more flagrant the injustices she makes him commit, the more certain she is that she will be talked about, and that is all she wants. Her obligations to me are beyond reckoning, for she owes me everything, even her life, yet she is so wicked that, instead of having my husband confirmed in his appointment with an increase in salary, which would have cost her only a word, she had him dismissed."

"I am amazed that, with such a character, she treated me so generously."

"Yes, I know the whole story; but if you knew it too you would not feel in the least grateful to her for what she did for you. She paid your expenses at the inn and in the Tower only to convince people in general that, to the Count's shame, you were her lover, and everyone in Barcelona knows that there was an attempt to murder you at her door and that the cutthroat whom you wounded died."

"But she cannot have ordered my murder, or been an accomplice in it, for that would be against nature."

"That I know; but is there anything in Nina which is not against nature? What I can tell you for certain is what I saw with my own eyes. During the hour the Count spent with her she did nothing but talk about you, your intelligence, your good manners, comparing the Spaniards with you to their disadvantage. The Count, annoyed, kept telling her to have done and talk of something else; but it was no use; in the end he left cursing you, and two days before what happened to you he told her that he would do her a favor she did not expect; and I can assure you that when we heard the shot a moment after you left she said with the utmost calm that it was certainly the favor the unfortunate nobleman had promised her. I told her that you might have been killed; and she replied that it was so much the worse for the Count, for his turn would come to find the man who would kill him. She began laughing at the thought of the sensation the news would produce in Barcelona the next day. However, at eight o'clock the next morning I saw her very well pleased when your servant came to tell her that you had been arrested and taken to the Citadel."

"My servant! I never knew that he had any communication with her."

"You were not meant to know it; but I assure you that the man loved you."

"I was convinced of it. But go on."

"She then wrote the proprietor of your inn a note which she did not show me but in which she must have ordered him to supply you with everything you needed. Your servant told us that he had seen your bloodstained sword and the hole in your cloak, and she was very glad to hear it; but never believe that it was because she loved you, for she said that, having escaped being murdered, you might take your revenge. What puzzled us was to guess on what pretext the Count had had you arrested.

"That evening we did not see him. He came the next day at eight o'clock, and the infamous creature received him with smiles and an air of the greatest contentment. She said she had heard that he had had you imprisoned, and that he had done well, for he could only have done it to safeguard you from what might be attempted against you by the same enemies who had tried to take your life. He replied drily that your being arrested had nothing to do with what had happened to you that night. He said that you were in custody for only a few days, for your papers would be examined, and you would be set free as soon as nothing was found in them to make you deserve a more rigorous imprisonment. She asked him who the man you had wounded was; and he replied that the police were making inquiries, for neither a wounded man nor any traces of blood had been found. He told her that your hat had been found and had been sent to you. I left her alone with him until midnight. Three days later everyone knew that you had been imprisoned in the Tower. That evening she asked the Count the reason for it, and he replied that all three of your passports might be forged, since the one you had from the Venetian Ambassador, dated at San Ildefonso, could not but be so. Everyone knew that, since you were in disfavor with your country, it was impossible that your Ambassador had given you a passport; and it was certain that, if the Venetian one was forged, the ones from the King and the Count of Aranda must be forged too, for foreigners are not given passports unless they first present one from their country's Ambassador. He[38] said that, on this supposition, you had to be strictly confined, and that you would not be released until your passports came back from the Court confirmed by those who were responsible for them. That was all.

"It was the arrest of the painter Pogomas which made us certain that it could only be he who had denounced you to the Government as a forger, to avenge himself for your having had him turned out of our house. The painter remained under arrest in the Citadel, and we thought that he must be being held to substantiate his accusation. This reasoning made us suppose that you would be released as soon as we learned that Pogomas had been removed from the Citadel only to be sent to Genoa. This meant that your passports had returned from the Court recognized as authentic; however, seeing that you were still kept there, Nina no longer knew what to think, and the Count made no reply to her further questions concerning your imprisonment. False as she is, she approved of his secrecy, respecting the reasons he might have for keeping silent on the subject.

"We finally learned that you had been unconditionally released. Nina was sure she would see you in the parterre and would triumph in her box before an audience which would consider her the person who had obliged the Captain-General to restore you to freedom. She was preparing to show herself in her box in her most splendid attire, when she was astonished to learn that there would be no more performances for three days. It was not until that evening that she learned from the Count himself that your passports and your papers had been returned to you and that you had been ordered to leave; she praised her mad lover's prudence. She saw that you would not dare go to her house, and she believed that you must have received secret orders, even to being forbidden to write to her, when she saw that you had gone without writing her a note. She said that if you had had the courage to ask her she would have left with you. But she was greatly surprised when she learned from your manservant a week later that you had only escaped the cutthroats by a sort of miracle. She laughingly told the Count the story, to which he replied that he knew nothing about it. Give thanks to God that you were able to leave Spain alive. Your becoming acquainted with the monster in Valencia should have cost you your life; the state of misfortune in which you find me is her doing, and God is justly punishing me for having brought her into the world.''

''What do you mean?''

''I mean what I say. Nina is my daughter.''

''Is it possible? Everyone thinks she is your sister.''

''She is my sister too, for she is the daughter of my father.''

''What! Your father loved you?''

''Yes, I was sixteen years old when he made me big with her. She is the child of sin; and a just God decrees that it shall be she who punishes me. My father died to escape her vengeance; but perhaps I shall cut her throat before she cuts mine. I should have strangled her in the cradle.''

Overcome with horror, I did not know what to say to this dreadful narrative, the truth of which was not to be doubted. I asked her if Nina knew that she was her daughter, and she replied that her father himself had told her so when she was eleven years old, and that it was the same worthy father who had had her virginity and who would certainly have given her a child too if he had not died in the same year

On hearing this second outrage committed by the charlatan Pelandi, I could not help laughing. The man had the misfortune to fall in love with his daughters and his granddaughters. I thought to myself that, in a state of nature, the thing would not arouse horror, and that all the horror that was felt for it came only from education and force of habit. I asked the woman how Count Ricla had come to fall in love with Nina.

''Listen. It is not a long story, and it is a strange one.

She had no sooner arrived in Barcelona two years ago, coming from Lisbon, where she had left her husband Bergonzi, than she was engaged as a figurante in the ballets because of her beautiful face, for, so far as talent goes, she can't dance a step. All she can do is make the turning leap called rebaltade; when she makes it she has the pleasure of hearing the parterre applaud her because they see her underdrawers up to the waist. You must know that there is a theatrical regulation here which makes any dancer who shows her drawers to the audience in a caper liable to a fine of an écu. Nina, who knew nothing about it, did her rebaltade, the audience applauded, she did another, even higher, and at the end of the ballet the censor told her that at the end of the month she would be docked two écus because of her shameless capers. She cursed and swore, but she could not get the better of the law. Do you know what she did the next day to avenge herself? She appeared without drawers, and she did her rebaltade the same as ever, which raised a storm of laughter in the parterre such as had never been heard in Barcelona. Count Ricla, who, in his stage box, had seen her better than anyone, being equally overcome by horror and admiration, told the censor, for whom he sent at once, that the audacious flouter of the law must be exemplarily punished otherwise than by fines.

" 'Meanwhile,' he said, 'have her brought to me.'

"Whereupon Nina marches into the Viceroy's box with her impudent air and asks him what he wants with her.

" 'You are a shameless creature who has failed in respect to the public and the laws and who deserves to be severely punished.'

" 'What have I done?'

" 'You made the same jump as you did day before yesterday.'

" 'That is true, but I did not break your Catalan law, for no one can say that he saw my drawers. To make sure that no one would see them, I didn't put any on. Could I do any more in obedience to your accursed law, which has already cost me two écus? Answer me.'

"The Viceroy and all the grave personages of his entourage had to make an effort to keep from laughing, for, as you know, gravity does not countenance laughter. The diabolical Nina was in the right after all, and to discuss whether the law had been broken or not would have entailed bringing up the most laughable details in order to prove Nina twice guilty. So the Viceroy merely told her that if she ever took it into her head to dance without underdrawers again she would be sent to prison on bread and water for a month. She obeyed.

"A week later a new ballet of my husband's was given which pleased the audience so much that an encore was demanded. The Count sent word that the audience was to be satisfied, and the dancers, male and female, were told in their dressing rooms to return to the stage and take their positions. Nina, who had nearly undressed, tells my husband that he will have to do without her. It was not possible; she had a role which was necessary to the ballet. She laughs at his arguments, she refuses. My husband tells the censor for what reason he cannot satisfy the audience; the censor goes into Nina's box, he tries to persuade her, he does not succeed, he scolds her, he threatens her, it is no use; he speaks roughly to her; at that Nina gets up and pushes him out the door so forcefully that the little fellow almost falls down. He repairs to His Excellency's box, tells him what has happened, and two soldiers instantly go to bring Nina before the Governor as she is, not in her shift, but in a state of undress to offend decency and to prove the undoing of a man who, if he was to punish her, did not need to see her so nearly naked. You know how beautiful the vixen is. In an unsteady voice the Governor says what he has to say to her, but Nina boldly tells him in so many words that he can have her killed but that he cannot make her dance.

" 'To the devil with Spain, the audience, and the whole earth, I do not want to dance, and you are in the wrong to try to force me to, since it is not in my contract that I must appear in the same ballet twice on the same evening; and I am so outraged by your tyrannical proceedings and the insult you have put upon me by an act of abominable despotism that I now tell you that I will not dance on this stage either tonight or tomorrow or ever. I do not ask a copper of you, let me go home, and know that I am a Venetian and free. I admit that, despite that, you can subject me to all kinds of ill-treatment. I will bear it firmly, and if you do not have me killed I will avenge myself by going to proclaim to all Italy how you treat decent women in your country.'

"The astonished Governor declared that Nina was mad. He sent for my husband again and told him to give the ballet without her, and not to count on her in future, for she was no longer engaged. He then told Nina to go, and gave orders that she was not to be interfered with. She went back to her box, where she dressed and returned to our house, where she was living. My husband gave the ballet as well as he could, but the Governor, Count Ricla, found that he had fallen violently in love with the shameless creature. She had a valuable ring, which she was thinking of selling in order to return to Italy at once.

"It was Molinari,[39] a very bad singer, who came the next morning to tell her that His Excellency wanted to see her on the next day at a small country house, to assure himself that she was not mad, or that, having spoken to him as he had never in his life been spoken to before, she was so. It was just what Nina wanted; she felt sure that she would complete her conquest of him. She told Molinari to tell His Excellency that he would find her well-behaved and amenable. That first interview, under Molinari's proc . . . . ship,[40] was followed by all the rest. To keep the nobleman and assure herself that he will never escape from her chains, she ill-treats him from time to time, and thus she makes him happy when she is gracious to him. He cannot leave her."

This is all that I learned from the incestuous Schizza, who was then perhaps forty years of age. Two years hence my reader will find himself in Bologna, where he will see Nina again. We will speak of her at that time.

The next day I found Henriette's answer at the post office. Here is a copy of it:

"Nothing, my old friend, is more like a romance than our meeting at my country house six years ago and our present encounter twenty-two years[41] after our parting in Geneva. We have both aged. Will you believe that, though I still love you, I am very glad that you did not recognize me? It is not that I have become ugly, but putting on flesh has given me a different countenance. I am a widow, happy, and well enough off to tell you that if you should be short of money with the bankers you will find it in Henriette's purse. Do not come back to Aix to recognize me, for your return might give rise to speculation; but if you come back some time hence, we can see each other, though not as old acquaintances. I feel happy when I think that I may have helped to prolong your life by putting with you a woman whose kind heart and whose fidelity I knew. I am very glad that she told you all. If you would like to maintain a correspondence with me, I shall do all that I can to make it a regular one. I am very curious to know what you did after your escape from the Leads. I promise, now that you have given me such strong proof of your discretion, that I will tell you the whole story of what brought about our meeting at Cesena,[42] and of my return to my country. The first is a secret from everyone. Only Monsieur d'Antoine[43] knows a part of it. I am grateful to you for not having made any inquiries about me here, though Marcolina[44] must have told you all that I asked her to. Tell me what became of that charming girl. Farewell."

Her letter made up my mind for me. Henriette had grown wise; the force of temperament had diminished in her as it had in me. She was happy, I was not. If I went back to Aix for her, people would have guessed things which no one should know; and what would I have done? I could only become a burden to her. I wrote her a long letter in reply, and I accepted the correspondence which she proposed. I gave her a general account of all my vicissitudes, and she told me all the details of her life in thirty or forty letters which I shall add [45] to these memoirs if Henriette dies before me. She is still alive today, old and happy.

The next day I called on Madame Audibert[46] and I went with her to pay a visit to Madame N. N.,[47] who by then had three children whom her husband adored; I gave her the good news of Marcolina which I had received from Venice and of which I shall speak in the year 1774, when I return to my country. I also told her the story of what had happened to me with Croce, and of the death of Charlotte,[48] which greatly touched her. She gave me very recent news of Rosalie,[49] who, with her husband's fortune, had become very rich. Alas! I could not hope to see her again, for in Genoa the sight of Signor Agostino Grimaldi would not have amused me.[50] My dear ex-niece mortified me without being aware of it. She told me that she found me aged. A man can easily rise above the unwelcome feeling this compliment may arouse in him; nevertheless it is still displeasing to one who has not renounced gallantry. She gave me a fine dinner, and her husband made me offers which I was ashamed to accept. I still had fifty louis, and, having decided to go to Turin, I had resources there. At Marseilles I found the Duke of Villars[51] whom Tronchin was keeping alive by his art. That nobleman, the Governor of Provence, invited me to supper, where I was surprised to find the Marquis d'Aragon,[52] who held the bank. I punted for small stakes, I lost, and the Marquis invited me to dine with his wife, an old Englishwoman, who had brought him, as I think I said before, a dowry of forty thousand guineas and twenty thousand which would revert to a son she had in London. It was from this fortunate Neapolitan that I was not ashamed to borrow another fifty louis.

I left Marseilles alone, having taken a place in a carriage which was going to Antibes, and from there I went to Nice, where I joined company with an Abate to go to Turin by way of the Colle di Tenda,[53] which is the highest of all the Alps. Going by this route, I had the satisfaction of seeing the beauty of the country which is called Piedmont. I arrived in Turin, where the Cavaliere Raiberti[54] and the Comte de la Pérouse[55] received me with the greatest satisfaction. They both found me aged, but after all I could only be relatively so at my then age of forty-four years. I struck up a close friendship with Sir XXX,[56] the English Envoy, a charming man, well read, rich, with excellent taste, who kept a choice table, whom everyone loved, among others a Parmesan dancer named Campioni,[57] than whom it was difficult to see a prettier woman.

As soon as I told my friends my idea of going to Switzerland to print at my expense a confutation in Italian of the History of the Venetian Government by Amelot de la Houssaye, they all eagerly undertook to find me subscribers who would pay me in advance for a certain number of copies. The most generous of all was the Comte de la Pérouse, who gave me twenty-five Piedmontese gold pistoles for fifty copies. I left a week later with two thousand Piedmontese lire in my purse for copies thus paid for in advance, which enabled me to print the entire work, which I had sketched out in the Tower in the Citadel of Barcelona, but which I had to write in full with the author whom I wanted to refute at hand, together with the History of Venice by the Procurator Nani.[58] Provided with these books, I set out, resolved to go to have my work printed in Lugano, where there was a good press and no censorship. In addition I knew that the proprietor of the press was a man of letters, and that there was excellent fare there and good society. Not far from Milan, very near to Varese, where the Duke of Modena went to spend the season, close to Coire, to Como, to Chiavenna, and to Lake Maggiore, in which were the famous Borromean Islands, I should be in a place where I could very easily amuse myself; I went there, and I at once went to lodge at the inn which was considered the best. Its proprietor was Taglioretti,[59] who immediately gave me the best of all his rooms.

The next morning I went to see Doctor Agnelli,[60] the printer, who was a priest, a theologian, and a man of good reputation. I made a formal agreement with him, in which he promised to give me four sheets a week, each in twelve hundred copies, I undertook to pay him each week, and he reserved the right of censorship, hoping, however, that he would always be of the same opinion as I. I began at once by giving him a preface and a foreword which would keep him busy for a week, after choosing my paper and prescribing the size I wanted, large octavo.

When I got back to the inn for dinner the innkeeper announces the Bargello,[61] who wanted to speak to me. The Bargello was the chief constable. Though Lugano belonged to the thirteen cantons, its police had the same organization as those of Italian cities. Curious to know what this ill-omened personage could want with me, and in any case having no choice but to listen to him, I have him shown in. Hat in hand, he tells me that he has come to offer me his services, to assure me that, though a foreigner, I should enjoy every privilege in his city with no fear for my safety in the streets if I had enemies or for my personal liberty if I had difficulties with the Venetian Government.

"I thank you, and I am sure that what you tell me is true, for I know that I am in Switzerland."

"I make bold to tell you that the custom is that all foreigners who come here, and who want to be sure that the asylum they are granted is inviolable, pay a trifling sum in advance, either by the week or the month or the year."

"And if they should not want to pay?"

"They could not count themselves safe."

"Very good. I will tell you that I fear nothing, and that consequently I count myself safe, and more than safe, without going to the trouble of paying."

"Excuse me, but I know that you are on bad terms with the State of Venice."

"You are mistaken, my friend."

"Oh, no I'm not."

"See if you can find someone who will wager two hundred zecchini that I have nothing to fear from Venice, and I will put them up in an hour."

The Bargello is taken aback, the innkeeper, who was present, tells him that he may well be mistaken, and he leaves in great astonishment. The innkeeper, very glad to have overheard the dialogue, told me that, since I intended to stay in Lugano three or four months, I might well show the Captain, or High Bailiff, who was equivalent to the Governor and who had all authority, the courtesy of going to call on him. He was, he said, a very honest and amiable Swiss gentleman, with a young wife who was very intelligent and as beautiful as possible.

"Oh, in that case I assure you I will go there tomorrow."

Toward noon the next day I go there, I am announced, I enter, and I see Monsieur de ——[62] with his charming wife and a little boy five or six years old. We stand there motionless, staring at one another.

CHAPTER VII

Marazzani punished. My departure from Lugano. Turin. Monsieur Dubois in Parma. Leghorn. Departure of Orlov with the fleet. Pisa. Stratico. Siena. The Marchesa Chigi. My departure from Siena with an Englishwoman.

THEY ARE my life's finest moments—these happy, unforeseen, unexpected, purely fortuitous meetings, due to chance alone, and hence all the more precious. Monsieur de R. was the first to break the silence and embrace me fondly. We quickly exchanged the excuses we thought we owed each other as old friends, for in other respects we had both done our duty, I not having known his name, and he thinking that other Italians might bear the same name as I. It went without saying that I had to take pot luck at dinner with them that very day, and in the course of it our old acquaintance was entirely renewed and everything we had to say to each other was said. His Republic had given him this extremely lucrative governorship; he was only sorry that it would last but two years. He was delighted, as I was, that Fortune had placed him there at a time when he could be of use to me, and he assured me that I could count upon him in anything that lay in his power. I could ask nothing more. He learned with the greatest delight that, being there to print a work of which I was the author, I should have to make a stay of four or five months, and he was greatly disappointed when I told him that I could accept his offer of his table at most once a week, for, the work being only sketched out, I had to write at night what I would give to be printed during the day, when I should be equally busy correcting proofs.

Madame could not get over her surprise. It was nine years since I had left her at Soleure, so beautiful that I should never have believed that a few more years could make her more beautiful, yet I found her so. I congratulated her on it, and she seemed to know that I was not flattering her; she kept calling my attention to their only offspring, a boy whose mother she had become four years[1] after my departure. She loved him more than the light of her eyes, so she seemed to be on the way to making a spoiled child of him. However, I am told that he is now most likable. In a quarter of an hour Madame de R. informed me of all that had happened at Soleure after my departure which could be of interest to me. The principal piece of news was that Lebel [2] and his wife had gone to settle in Besançon, where she believed that they were very prosperous. As for the story of all that had happened to me in nine years, Madame de R. saw from the summary I gave her that it would be enough to keep her entertained for several days during the long stay I was to make in Lugano.

A truth which the charming woman told me, namely, that she did not find the look of youth in me which I had had in Soleure, was enough to make me renounce any idea I might have had of resuming an amorous relationship with her. "So much the better," I said to myself on the way back to my inn, "I will be her friend, and I will make myself worthy to be Monsieur de R.'s." The work which I intended to publish could not permit me the least distraction, and a love affair would have absorbed the better part of my time. I set to work the next morning, being interrupted for only an hour by a visit from Monsieur de R. On the following day I received the first sheet, which I corrected, and I was well enough pleased. I spent the whole of the first month in my room, going out only on feast days to hear mass, to dine at Madame de R.'s, and to take the air with her and her baby. Since I worked fourteen hours a day, at the end of a month the printer delivered the first volume to me; meanwhile I had got the whole of the second ready. A month later I finished the entire work, divided into three volumes, which the printer delivered to me at the end of October. In less than a year I sold my whole edition.

My purpose in printing this work was to earn a pardon from the Venetian State Inquisitors. After traveling from one end of Europe to the other, I was so overcome by a longing to return to my native country that it seemed to me I could no longer live anywhere else. Amelot de la Houssaye had written his History of the Government of Venice as an inveterate enemy of the Venetians; his history was a satire, which contained learned disquisitions interlarded with slanders. In all the seventy years during which Amelot's work had been in everyone's hands, no one had taken the trouble to refute it. A Venetian living in Venice who wanted to challenge the author's lies by pointing them out in print would not have obtained permission from the Government, whose rule is not to let anyone discuss it, either in praise or in blame. Hence until then no writer had dared to refute the satirical historian, for instead of the reward he had deserved he could expect nothing but punishment. I thought it was my part to undertake such a work. The reasons I might have for complaining of a government from which a body which despotically persecuted me drew its powers freed me from any suspicion of partiality; and the irrefutability with which I was sure I could expose Amelot's lies and blunders to all Europe made me sure of a reward which, since it consisted only in an act of justice, seemed to me certain. Permission to return to my country was due me, after fourteen years in which a despotic power forced me to remain absent from it. I thought the State Inquisitors could not but seize the opportunity to repair their injustice on the pretext of giving me a reward which my patriotism had deserved. The reader will see that I guessed rightly; but they made me wait for it five more years. Signor Bragadin having died, I had only two friends left in Venice, Signor Dandolo and Signor Barbaro. It was they who secretly procured me fifty subscribers even in Venice.

During all the time I spent in Lugano the only house I frequented was Monsieur de R.'s. I had several conversations with the Abate Riva,[3] a man both learned and wise, to whom I had been recommended by the celebrated Signor Angelo Querini,[4] a relative of his. The Abate enjoyed so great a reputation for prudence among his compatriots that he was chosen to be the arbiter in almost all the differences which arose among them and which they would otherwise have had to take to court. The brood of chicaning lawyers loathed him and considered him their greatest enemy. Their hatred was his aureole. His nephew, Count Giovanni Battista,[5] devoted in equal measure to the Muses, to Bacchus, and to Venus, was my only friend, though I could not drink glass for glass with him. He lent me all the girls whom he had initiated, and they only loved him the more, for I gave them money. It was with him and two very pretty sisters that I made a voyage to the Borromean Islands in Lake Maggiore.

I knew that Count Federico Borromeo,[6] who had honored me with his friendship in Turin, was there, and, sure that I should be well received, I went there with my friend and the two pretty girls, one of whom was to pass as his wife. In this way her sister would be properly accounted for. At Count Borromeo's they slept together. That nobleman, though ruined, lived there like a prince.

It is impossible so to describe these islands as to give the reader any adequate idea of how delicious they are. One enjoys a perpetual spring there; it is never either hot or cold. The Count treated us to delicate fare; and he amused our young ladies by a fishing party. Very ugly, old, disgraced, ruined, he was still able to please. On the way back to Lugano on the fourth day, when I tried to give room to a carriage on a viaduct, my horse slipped over the edge and fell ten feet. Having hit my head against a large stone, I thought I had cracked my skull. A copious bleeding, performed as soon as I got back to Lugano, freed me from all apprehension. It was the last time I rode horseback.

During this time the inspectors sent by all the thirteen cantons[7] arrived in Lugano. The Luganese call them Ambassadors, Monsieur de R. called them avoyés. They all lodged at Taglioretti's. I ate with them during the whole of the week they spent there. The one from Bern[8] gave me news of my poor friend M. F.[9] and his family which pleased me. His charming daughter Sara[10] had become the wife of Monsieur de V., and she was happy.

It was after the inspectors left that one fine morning I saw in my room the unfortunate Marazzani,[11] whom I no sooner saw than I took him by the collar. He shouts, he vainly uses all his strength to defend himself, I drag him outside, he falls, and I fall on him before he has time to use either his walking stick or his sword; I slap him, I pummel him, the innkeeper comes running at the noise, and the servants force me to contain my fury. I tell the innkeeper not to let him get away, and to send for the Bargello to put him in prison. I go back to my room, leaving him shouting protests, and I try to dress quickly to go and tell the whole story to Monsieur de R. The Bargello arrives, he comes to ask me why he is to put the man in prison, and I reply that he will learn the reason from Monsieur de R., to whom I am going at once. Here is the reason for my anger.

The reader may remember that I had left the wretch in Buen Retiro when the Alcalde Messa had released me from that inferno and escorted me to my inn. I learned afterward that he had been sent to a Presidio[12] in Africa, where he served the King of Spain as a rower on a galley with the pay of a soldier; but, not knowing what to do about it, I blotted him from my memory. Yet the man was guilty of no crime. His only offense had been that he was without a sponsor, without money, and without employment in the city of Madrid, where at that time the police regulations were very strict and especially in respect to vagabonds.

Eight months later at Barcelona I saw among the dancers at the opera La Bellucci,[13] a Venetian girl whom I had loved before her marriage. I had left her husband in Riga, where he still is today; I felt that I should like to go and give her news of him, and also, if she liked, to renew our old relationship. I go there the next day; she cries out for joy when she sees me, she returns my embrace, and she says she is happy that I have had the good luck to escape from the terrible misfortune into which tyranny had plunged me.

"I do not know what misfortune you mean."

"The Presidio, where you were sentenced to hard labor, which usually costs those who are not used to it their lives."

"I was never sentenced to labor in any Presidio. Who told you this tale, which is an insult to me?"

"A Count Marazzani, who spent three weeks here, who had the same misfortune, and who, luckier than you, managed to escape."

"The shameless scoundrel lied to you, but the slander will cost him dear."

From that moment on the fact that the man existed never arose in my memory without my burning with the desire to find him somewhere and make him pay for such a black calumny. It was at Lugano that his destiny brought him into my presence. What I had done had sprung from a first impulse, and it seemed to me that I had done nothing, for after all I had only engaged in a fist fight with him, in which I had perhaps received as much as I gave. He was in prison, and I went to see what punishment Monsieur de R. could inflict on the scoundrel to give me some slight satisfaction.

As soon as Monsieur de R. was informed of the facts, he said that he could neither keep him in prison nor banish him from the city unless I would lodge a complaint with him in which I would ask him for protection from the man, who I had good reason to believe had come to Lugano expressly to murder me. He told me that I could substantiate my accusation by citing the genuine complaints I had against him and by putting the most sinister interpretation on his appearing in my room without having had himself announced.

"Do that," he said, "and we shall see what he answers; I will ask him for his passport; I will drag the thing out; I will order him treated harshly; but in the end I shall only be able to banish him from the city, unless he gives good security for himself and his behavior."

It was all I could ask of the worthy man; I drew up the complaint, and the next morning I insisted on having the pleasure of seeing him brought before him in chains in my presence. He said that it was certainly not true that he had entered my room to murder me, and that he had said in Barcelona that I was in a Presidio, sentenced to hard labor, only because he had been told as much, and that if it was not true he was very glad that he had been misinformed. The Captain told him that hearsay cannot excuse anyone who publicly repeats a calumny which casts doubt on a man's honor, and that he could not in justice refuse me the reparation which I demanded. He also told him that my suspicion that he had entered my room to murder me might be well founded, since I alleged that he had given a false name at the inn, which I undertook to prove, offering security, which would compensate him if it turned out that he was, as he claimed to be, Count Marazzani. In consequence, he told him, he would remain in prison only until an answer came from Piacenza to say whether he was or was not what he said he was.

"If you are Count Marazzani," he said, "Monsieur Casanova will give you whatever satisfaction you wish, and if you are not I promise you that your only punishment will be banishment from Lugano and the entire district."

He had to go to prison, where the Bargello did not have to be asked twice to make it unpleasant for him, since the scoundrel had not a copper. Monsieur de R. wrote to the agent of the thirteen cantons in Parma to obtain the requisite information; but the shameless scoundrel, knowing that the answer could not be what he wanted, wrote me a letter intended to touch me in which he confessed that he was a poor commoner from Bobbio,[14] and that though his name was Marazzani he had no connection with the Marazzani family of Piacenza. He begged me to let him go somewhere else.

After showing this letter to Monsieur de R., I had him set free, but under orders to leave Lugano within twenty-four hours. He remained in prison only four days, and, considering myself amply satisfied, I gave him some money and a letter of recommendation to Baron Sellentin,[15] who was in Augsburg recruiting soldiers for the King of Prussia. We will return to this fellow at the proper time and place.

The Chevalier de Brézé[16] came to the fair at Lugano[17] to buy horses; he spent two weeks there, constantly in my company at Madame de R.'s, whose charms had conquered him. Three or four days after his departure I left Lugano too, having resolved to spend the winter in Turin, where the friends I had and the English Envoy[18] led me to hope for every enjoyment. About this time I received a bill of exchange for a hundred ducats from Prince Lubomirski, who, after the death of the Grand Marshal to the Crown, Bielinski,[19] had been raised to that exalted post. The hundred ducats were the price of fifty copies of my work which I had sent him.

Arrived in Turin, I found at the post office a letter from the same noble Venetian, Signor Girolamo Zulian,[20] who, with the permission of the State Inquisitors, had recommended me to the Ambassador, Mocenigo, in Madrid. In the letter I found another, addressed to Signor Berlendis,[21] Resident of the Republic in Turin, who, when I delivered it to him, thanked me for having thus spared him the difficulty he would otherwise have had in receiving me. Berlendis, rich and with an excessive inclination for the fair sex, maintained a splendid establishment. That was enough to have it said in Venice that he did honor to his position as Resident of the Republic. To represent Venice at foreign courts intelligence was no requirement. On the contrary, it was the man who had it and tried to use it who would fall into disfavor with the Senate, which does nothing but what the College[22] commands. In Venice "the College" means the council of the Ministers of the State Cabinet. Berlendis could not but be well regarded, for he had no pretensions to intelligence.

Sure that it could only do me good, I persuaded him, after giving him two copies of my work, to send it officially to the State Inquisitors. I thought the answer he received,[23] and which he gave me to read, very strange. The Secretary of the redoubtable Tribunal told him that he had done very well to send the Tribunal a work the mere title page of which was enough to prove the author's audacious temerity. He told him that it would be examined, and that in the meanwhile he was to keep a close watch on me and above all not to favor me in any way which could lead the Court to suppose that he was protecting me as a Venetian. The Secretary expressed the mind of the Tribunal. Its members at that time were not those who had opened the way to the Ambassador in Madrid for me. I thought it my part to be as circumspect as Berlendis, never going to see him except sometimes early in the morning to drink coffee. A Corsican Abate, his son's tutor, interested me much more than he did. He was a man of letters, a good writer in prose and a good poet. He is the Abate Andrais,[24] who now lives in England a free man.

I spent my time in Turin very tranquilly in the company of Epicureans. The old Cavaliere Raiberti, the Comte de la Pérouse, a charming Abate di Rubione,[25] a pleasure-loving Count Rica,[26] the English Envoy, and some literary work kept me very pleasantly occupied; no love affairs. Frequent suppers with very pretty girls quenched our desires before they had become strong enough to make us unhappy. A milliner who was La Pérouse's mistress died about that time after swallowing her lover's portrait instead of the Eucharist. The incident inspired me to write two sonnets, which pleased me and still please me. I had a literary controversy with Baretti,[27] who died while he was still in London and whose motto should have been: Ille Bioneis sermonibus et sale nigro ("Another [enjoys] Bion's satiric discourses with their caustic raillery").[28] He wrote in pure Italian, and his only claim to fame was the biting wit which filled everything he wrote, for he was completely without learning and without sound literary judgment. He had a thorough command of English, yet he made it unpleasing by trying to combine it with the beauties of Italian.

During this time[29] I thought I could make my fortune by going to Leghorn and offering my services to Count Alexis Orlov,[30] who was in command of the fleet which was to go to Constantinople and which might have gone there if it had been commanded by an Englishman.

The English Envoy, Sir XXX,[31] gave me a strong letter of recommendation for Leghorn addressed to his country's Consul there. I left Turin with very little money in my pocket and without a letter of credit on any banker. The Englishman Aston[32] recommended me to an English man of business who had settled in Leghorn, but his recommendation did not go so far as to authorize me to ask him for money. Another letter, from the Abate Andrais, recommended me to the Corsican Rivarola,[33] also settled in Leghorn, a man of intelligence and a great friend of Paoli's.[34] The Englishman Aston was then engaged in a strange affair in Turin. He had fallen in love in Venice with a very beautiful woman, I forget whether Greek or Neapolitan. The woman's husband was a Turinese named Sclopis,[35] who put nothing in the way of the rich and generous Englishman's amour, but who was becoming an inconvenience to the lover and his wife precisely at the moments when common decency demanded that he should not be. Such a husband is more trying than a jealous one, and unfortunately the lover cannot talk sense to him, for he is the husband. Aston, in a situation the embarrassment of which an English gentleman, generous and in love, cannot tolerate, determined, with his beauty's approval, to speak plainly to her husband. He asked him if he needed a thousand guineas, and he offered them to him on condition that he would let him travel for three years with the lady without going to the trouble of escorting her. Signor Sclopis accepted the proposal, and signed an agreement in writing. The three years having expired, Sclopis, who was in Turin, wrote his wife, who was in Venice, to return to him, and wrote Aston not to prevent her from doing so. His wife answered that she would no longer live with him, and Aston gave him to understand that he neither could nor would send her away; and, thinking that the cuckold would no doubt apply to the English Envoy, he informed Sir XXX of the matter and asked him for his good offices; Sir XXX at once spoke to the Cavaliere Raiberti, who was then Minister of Foreign Affairs. Sclopis spoke to him at the same time, demanding that he write to the Resident in Turin, the Commendatore Camerana,[36] to demand her officially from the Venetian Government, and persuaded Berlendis to add to his letter that, his (Sclopis's) claim being perfectly justified, his demand should be honored and his wife made to leave Venice, even against her will. There is no doubt that the thing would have been done if the Commendatore Camerana had demanded her at the same time, but the Cavaliere Raiberti, more a man of honor than a scrupulous Christian in respect to the laws which consider marriage a sacrament, not only did not write to the Resident Camerana, but, informed of the matter by XXX, and having a view of it directly contrary to that of the Venetian Resident Berlendis, cordially received Aston, who had come to Turin to pursue it, having left Signora Sclopis in Venice under the protection of the English Resident.[37] Sclopis was ashamed to complain publicly, for the agreement he had signed covered him with opprobrium; but Berlendis made everyone laugh by saying publicly that the husband Sclopis was in the right, and that it was shameful that he was not given his due without delay, for after all he was the husband; and, there being no legal divorce between his wife and himself, he could not be prevented from living with her again, and the more so because the three years for which he had been weak enough to cede his rights in her had passed.

"What would you say," I asked Berlendis on the day before I left, "if Sclopis, whom you are protecting, had sent word to Aston that he would stop plaguing him in return for a thousand guineas which he would give him for another three years' lease?"

"It is too infamous; I do not believe it."

"You are wrong. The thing is well known, and you are making yourself ridiculous, or, if that were possible, suspect of something which would dishonor you; but take comfort, no one believes that, for you are known to be rich and a gentleman. I advise you to abandon what you call the just cause of Signor Sclopis, who is unworthy to enjoy the privileges of a sacrament which he is willing to sell."

Berlendis blushed fiery red. Erubuit: salva res est ("He has blushed: all is well").[38] I left, and two years later in Bologna I found Aston and La Sclopis, whose beauty I admired. She had a charming little Aston in her lap. I gave her news of her sister; but I will speak of that in the proper place.

I traveled from Turin to Parma with a Venetian, who, like myself, was wandering about outside his country, unable to live there for reasons known to the State Inquisitors. He had turned actor to earn his living, and he was going to Parma with two actresses, one of whom was worthy to be loved. When he learned who I was, he became my intimate friend; and he would have allowed me to share in all the pleasures which our traveling companions could have offered us; but I was not in the mood for amusement. I was going to Leghorn with chimerical ideas. I thought I could make myself indispensable to Count Alexis Orlov in his intended conquest of Constantinople; I imagined that, without me, he would never pass the Dardanelles,[39] that such was the decree of Fate, like the one she had pronounced in regard to the taking of Troy, which could never have been accomplished without the presence of Achilles.[40] Meanwhile, I took a great liking to the young Venetian, whose name was Angelo Bentivoglio,[41] and whom the State Inquisitors never forgave for a crime than which philosophy knows none more trifling. I will speak of him when my reader finds me back in Venice, four years hence.

Arriving in Parma about noon, I said good-by to Bentivoglio and his two companions. I was at once told that the Court was at Colorno;[42] but I had no business at the Court. Determined to leave the next day for Bologna, I invited myself to dinner with the hunchbacked Dubois-

Chatellerault,[43] Director of the Infante's[44] Mint, a man of intelligence, vain, and with a great deal of talent. My reader may remember that I had known him twenty-two years earlier, during the happy days when I was in love with Henriette; I had seen him only twice since then, each time only for a moment. He received me with the cries of joy with which one greets an old acquaintance, and showed himself greatly obliged to me for my courtesy in spending my few hours in Parma with him. I told him that I was on my way to Leghorn, where Count Orlov was expecting me, and that I should travel day and night, for at the time we were speaking he must be setting sail. He assured me that he was ready to leave, and he showed me letters which he had just received from Leghorn; but with a little smile I assured him that he would not leave without me, whereupon Monsieur Dubois gave me a bow of politic admiration. He wanted to talk about the expedition, which was then setting all Europe to calculating; but my reserve made him change the subject. He showed me his fine engravings, which were indeed masterpieces, and he did me the honor to have me dine with his housekeeper. We spoke a great deal about Henriette, whose identity he boasted that he had managed to discover, and, though he spoke of her with great respect, I never gave him time to get anything out of me. So he spent the whole afternoon talking to me about himself, complaining of all the sovereigns in Europe, except the King of Prussia, who had created him a Baron though he did not know him and though he had never had anything to do with him either directly or indirectly.

He complained most of all of the Infante Duke of Parma, in whose service he was and who, never making up his mind to establish a mint, gave him nothing to do; he would not have entered his service if he could have foreseen that he would be like a canon in a chapter who was there only to enjoy his emoluments. He complained bitterly of the Court of Louis XV, at which he had asked for nothing but a glass of water, and had not obtained it. The "glass of water" was the order of St. Michael,[45] which was given to men of talent who certainly were no more worthy than he. Finally he complained of the Republic of Venice, which had not properly rewarded him for what he had done for it. He had spent a year in Venice setting up a coining press in the Republic's mint,[46] and he had done it well. After the operation Venice was able to strike edge-rolled coins, like all the other powers in Europe, and the present he had been given was a mere trifle. He had spent eight times what he had received. After telling him that he had every reason in the world to complain, I asked him to arrange for some banker to give me fifty zecchini, which I would return at whatever bank in Leghorn I was directed to; he answered very generously that there was no need of my going to a banker for such a trifle, for he could give me the amount himself. I accepted his offer, promising to return the money to him soon, but I was never in a position to repay this small debt. I do not know if he is still alive; but even if he should live to Nestor's age,[47] I have no hope that I shall ever be in a position again to return that small sum to him. I grow poorer every day, and I know that I am at the end of my career.

The next day I arrived in Bologna, and the day after that in Florence, where I found the Cavaliere Morosini,[48] nephew of the Procurator, a young man of nineteen, who was traveling with Count Stratico,[49] Professor of Mathematics at the University of Padua. He was with the young nobleman as his tutor. He gave me a letter for his brother,[50] a Dominican monk, Professor of Belles-Lettres at the University of Pisa. I stopped in Pisa for two hours only to make the acquaintance of this monk, who was as celebrated for his wit as for his learning. I found him even greater than he was famed to be, and I promised him I would spend some time in that city on another occasion expressly to enjoy his company. I stopped for an hour at the baths,[51] and I made the acquaintance of the "Pretender-in-vain" to the throne of Great Britain.[52] I arrived in Leghorn, where I found Count Orlov only because the weather was stormy.

The English Consul[53] immediately presented me; he was staying in his house. When he saw me, he seemed delighted to have the pleasure of seeing me again, for he had been well acquainted with me in Petersburg; and he seemed even better pleased when the Consul showed him the letter he had received from the English Envoy in Turin. He hastily told me that he would be delighted to have me with him on his own ship, so I should have my things taken on board, for he would leave as soon as the wind allowed; and, having a great deal to do, he left me with the Consul, who asked me in what capacity I was going to Constantinople with the Admiral.

"That is what I want to know before I have my few things taken on board his ship. You can understand that I must talk to him and that he must talk to me. Would one ever have believed that a Russian would have become such a Frenchman?"

"You cannot talk to him until tomorrow morning."

I go very early the next morning and I send him in a note in which he reads that before having my trunk sent on board his ship it was indispensable that I talk with him privately for at least a quarter of an hour. He was writing in bed, his Adjutant told me, so he asked me to wait.

"Gladly."

In comes Dall'Oglio,[54] Agent to the King of Poland in Venice and his old friend; he knew me from Berlin, and indeed had known me from my birth through old connections.

"What are you doing here?" he asked me.

"I must speak to the Admiral."

"He is extremely busy."

After giving me which news, he goes in. It is a piece of impertinence. Can he tell me more clearly that he is not busy for him? A moment later I see the Marchese Marucci,[55] with his order of St. Anne[56] and his stiff manner, who, congratulating me on my being in Leghorn, tells me that he is reading my confutation of Amelot, in which he had not expected to find himself.

He was right not to expect it, for there was nothing in common between him and my work; but he was not the sort of man to see nothing in the world except things he expected. If he had not gone in to the Admiral, I would have told him so. He told me he did not expect it only to make me understand that he had not found himself in it as he would have wished to be, and I knew it. I did not care: nescit vox missa reverti ("words once uttered cannot be recalled").[57] But I was annoyed to see that these gentlemen were inside, while I was outside. I began to dislike my project. Five hours later the Admiral comes out, followed by a great many people, to go to call on someone, saying pleasantly that we should speak at table or after dinner.

"After dinner," I replied.

He came back at two o'clock and sat down to dinner, at which the guests were those who sat down first. Fortunately I was one of them. Orlov, constantly repeating "Eat, gentlemen, eat," did nothing but read letters, handing them to a secretary after making notes on them in pencil. After dinner, during which I never spoke, when everyone was taking coffee standing, he looked at me as if startled, and, with a "by the way," took me by the hand and led me to a window niche, where he told me to have my trunk sent on board his ship at once, for if the wind held as it was he would leave before dawn.

"Permit me to ask you in what capacity you will take me with you; what post shall I have?"

"I have no post to give you, but that may come. Come on board as my friend."

"A most honorable condition, which would certainly always make me run the most obvious risk to my life in order to defend yours, but which will avail me nothing after the expedition, and even during the expedition, for you alone in your goodness would show me marks of confidence and esteem; all the others would have no regard for me at all. I should be considered no more than a man to make you laugh, and I should perhaps kill the first man who dared to show me the slightest sign of contempt. I need a post which makes it my duty to serve you in your uniform. I can be useful to you in every way. I know the country to which you are going, I speak the language, I am in good health, and I am not lacking in courage. I do not want your valuable friendship for nothing, I want the honor of earning it."

"My dear friend, I have no definite employment to give you."

"Then I wish you a good voyage, and I shall go to Rome. I hope you will never repent of not having taken me with you. Without me you will never pass the Dardanelles."

"Is that a prophecy?"

"It is an oracle."

"We shall see, my dear Calchas." [58]

This was literally the dialogue which I had with the worthy Count, who did not pass the Dardanelles. No one can know if he would have passed them if I had been with him.

The next morning I delivered the letters I had to Signor Rivarola and to the English man of business; the fleet sailed. On the following day I went to Pisa, where I spent a week very agreeably with Father Stratico, who two or three years later[59] became a Bishop by a very bold stroke which might have ruined him. He took it upon himself to deliver the funeral oration for Father Ricci,[60] who was the last General of the Jesuits. His oration, which praised the deceased, not ironically but in the most serious style, put Pope Ganganelli under the necessity of either punishing the orator, which would have been taken very ill, or of giving the world an example of heroic virtue by rewarding him; His Holiness found the latter course preferable to the former. Father Stratico himself told me, four or five years after he obtained the bishopric, that, knowing the human heart, he was sure that the Holy Father would punish his daring by a splendid reward.

In Pisa the monk initiated me into the charming society in which he delighted. He had chosen two or three well-born girls who combined beauty with talent, so that he could teach them to sing improvisations in which he accompanied them on the guitar. He had taught them the art of Corilla,[61] who was then famous and who six years later was crowned Poetessa by night on the Capitol[62] in Rome, the same place where our greatest poets had been crowned, which caused a great scandal, for after all Corilla's talent, though unique of its kind, consisted in nothing but a splendid show. The crowned Corilla was attacked in scathing satires, and the authors of them were even more in the wrong than those who profaned the Capitol by crowning her, for all the poisoned darts with which black envy made every effort to lacerate the celebrated woman found nothing to say but that chastity was not her favorite virtue, which proved the ignorance of the poets who assailed her. All the women poets who have existed from the time of Homer, from the time of the Sibyls, until ours were all votaries of Venus. But for that, their names would not have come down to posterity, for they could not become famous except by being immortalized by the pens of those who enjoyed their favors.[63] No one would have heard of Corilla if she had not been able to make men her lovers, and she would never have been crowned in Rome if she had not enslaved Prince Gonzaga Solferino,[64] who later married the pretty Rangoni, the daughter of the Roman Consul whom I knew in Marseilles.

To the door of the temple[65] in which the woman was crowned the following verses were affixed the day before the august ceremony took place:

Arce in Tarpeia, Caio regnante, sedentem
Nunquam vidit equum, Roma videbit equam.
Corillam patres obscura nocte coronant.
Quid mirum? Tenebris nox tegit omne nefas.

("In the reign of Caius a horse was never seen on the Tarpeian rock; Rome will now see a mare there. The Senators crown Corilla in the darkness of night. No wonder! Night hides all evil in its shadows.")

She should have been crowned by the light of day, or never; night was chosen, and it was a mistake. The day after her coronation these verses were posted up all over the city:

Corillam patres turba plaudente coronant
Altricem memores germinis esse lupam.
Proh scelus! impuri redierunt saecla Neronis
Indulget scortis laurea serta Pius.

("The Senators crown Corilla before an applauding crowd, remembering that the she-wolf [66] nurses her cubs. What infamy! The time of filthy Nero has returned. Pius [Pope Pius VI] bestows the laurel wreath on prostitutes.")

The thing is an ineffaceable stain on the pontificate of that Pope,[67] who still reigns, for it is certain that in future no poet will aspire to an honor which until that day Rome, far from scattering broadcast, had conferred only very rarely on geniuses who seemed to rise above human nature; hence this distich was posted on the Vatican:

Sacra fronde vilis frontem meretricula cingit;
Quis vatum tua nunc praemia Phoebe velit?

> ("The base harlot binds her brow with the sacred branch; what poet will now want your prizes, Apollo?")

A young Abate put a large sheet of paper containing the following four verses into Corilla's hands just as, trembling with fright, she entered the theater of Apollo, where she was awaited by a considerable number of Cardinals, by the Senator, and by the Conservatori of Rome. She took the paper, thinking it was a eulogy, and since the quatrain was in Latin it was read to her by Prince Gonzaga, who did not expect the next to the last word:

Quis pallor tenet ora? Tuos tremor occupat artus?
Ad Tarpeia times tecta movere pedes?
Femina pone metum: sint pronae Heliconis alumnae
Si nec Apollo tibi praesto, Priapus erit.

> ("Why is your face so pale? Are your limbs trembling? Do you fear to move on to the Capitol? Woman, be not afraid! May the Heliconian Muses favor you. If Apollo is not your guardian, Priapus will be." [68]

The impertinent Abate was looked for, but he had disappeared. On the next day but one after her coronation Corilla and her lovers all left Rome, ashamed to have succeeded in solemnizing such a scandal. The Abate Pizzi,[69] guardian of the sacred forests of the Arcadians,[70] who had been the chief promoter of the Poetessa's apotheosis, inundated with pamphlets and caustic satires from every direction, did not dare to leave his house for several months. But after this long digression let us return to Father Stratico, to whom I owed eight happy days in Pisa.

The monk, who, though not handsome, perfectly possessed the art of making himself loved, persuaded me to go to spend a week in Siena, promising me every pleasure of the heart and the mind from two letters of recommendation which he would give me, one to the Marchesa Chigi,[71] the other to the Abate Ciaccheri.[72] Having nothing better to do than to find pleasures where I could, I accepted his offer, and I went to Siena by the shortest road, not troubling to visit Florence.

The next morning I took Father Stratico's letter to the Abate Ciaccheri. He promised me all the amusements in his power, and he kept his word; but above all, as soon as I told him that I had a letter to the Marchesa Chigi, he himself took me to call on the lady, who made an unresisting conquest of me as soon as, still standing, she quickly read to herself the letter from her "dear Stratico." This was the epithet she accorded him as soon as she recognized his handwriting.

The lady was still beautiful. Though past her prime, she must have been sure that she could still please, for she knew how to make up for her want of youth by obliging ways, by graces, by an easy and affable manner, by her intelligence, by the pretty turn she gave to her remarks, and by the charms which she added to the beautiful language of her country by her own eloquence, which shone the more because she treated it as nothing, without the slightest pretension. I have told my reader beforehand what I found in her the next day, for I spent the first day entirely in studying her.

"Let us sit down," she said; "you will spend a week here, according to what my dear Stratico tells me; it is little for us, and hence too much for you. I hope he has not given you too favorable a report of us."

"He told me nothing, Signora, except that I must stay here a week, promising me that I should find here the charms of the heart and the mind; but I did not believe him. I have come to see if he told me the truth, at the same time resolved to keep my word to him. You see that I have not let him make up my mind for me."

"So much the better; but Stratico should have sentenced you to at least a month, without mercy."

"Why without mercy? What risk could I have run?"

"Of being bored to death, or leaving a piece of your heart in Siena."

"All that can happen in a week; but I defy either of those dangers, for Stratico protected me from the first of them by counting on you, and from the second by counting on me. You will receive my homage, and so that I may offer it to you pure, it will be only of the mind. My heart will leave this place as free as it is now; for since it cannot hope for a return, its defeat would make me unhappy."

"Is it possible that you are among the despairing?"

"Yes, fortunately; for I owe all my peace to my despair."

"But how unfortunate for you if you are mistaken!"

"Not as great a misfortune, Signora, as you suppose. Apollo assures me of an admirable subterfuge, he gives me an infallible way of escape. He leaves me only the freedom to enjoy the moment; but since it is a favor the god does me, I use it to the top of my bent. Carpe diem ['Seize the day'] [73] is my motto."

"It is the voluptuous Horace's; but I approve of it only in so far as it is convenient. The pleasure which follows on desires, and sometimes even on desires unsatisfied, is preferable, for it is infinitely more acute."

"True, but one cannot count on it. That distresses the philosopher who calculates. God preserve you, Signora, from learning that cruel truth from experience. The good to be preferred to all other goods is the good one enjoys; the good which one desires is often limited merely to the pleasure of desiring. It is a figment of the soul, the vanity of which I have too often experienced in my life. Yet I congratulate you if you have not yet learned that Horace is right."

At that the Marchesa, with a gracious smile, excused herself from either admitting or denying it. Ciaccheri, who had not said a word, told us that the most fortunate thing that could happen to us was never to agree; the Marchesa admitted it, laughing at Ciaccheri's subtle thought; and I denied it.

"If I admit it," I said, "I renounce the happiness which you make dependent upon never being in agreement. I would rather contradict you, Signora, than renounce the hope of pleasing you. The Abate Ciaccheri is a spoilsport who has thrown the apple of discord between us; but if we go on as we have begun, I will settle in Siena."

The Marchesa, very well pleased to have given me a good taste of her wit, then talked of everything and nothing, of Pisa, of Stratico, of Leghorn, of Rome, of the pleasure of traveling, and asked me if I wanted to make my way with the prettiest women in Siena by attending all the great assemblies, offering to take me everywhere; and, in all seriousness, I asked her not to think of going to that trouble.

"I want to be able to say, Signora, that during the week I spent in Siena I paid court to no one but you, and that no one but the Abate Ciaccheri showed me the monuments of the city and introduced me to its men of letters."

Flattered by this ultimatum, she invited me to dine next day, with the Abate, at a charming house which she owned a hundred paces from the city and which she called Vico.[74]

The older I grew, the more what attached me to women was intelligence. It became the medium which my blunted senses needed in order to enter into play. In men of a temperament different from mine, what happens is exactly the opposite. A sensual man who grows old wants only the material, women skilled in the arts of Venus, and not philosophical discourses. As we left the Marchesa's house I told Ciaccheri that if I stayed in Siena she would be the only woman I would see, and that the outcome should be as God willed. The Abate Ciaccheri could not but agree that I was right. In the course of the week he showed me everything worth seeing in the city, and made me acquainted with all the men of letters, who did not fail to call on me. Toward evening he took me to a house, where, he said, everything was free and easy—no formality, no introductions; people talked to be amusing, there was singing, there was instrumental music, beautiful verses were read aloud, one girl composed them to make up for her ugliness, her very pretty younger sister enjoyed their beauties and was content to afford a subject for them to those whom all of her charming person fired with love. The two sisters had two brothers, one of whom played the harpsichord, the other was a painter. Such was the house to which Ciaccheri took me to spend the evening, with another Abate, a young professor, whose name was Pistoi.[75] I saw neither father nor mother nor servants. But if the younger of the two sisters was a perfect beauty, the other was ugly without being either hunchbacked or lame or squint-eyed or dirty; but she was ugly, and all ugliness repels. Nevertheless the ugly girl did not lose heart, but talked to me sweetly and modestly about poetry, and asked me to recite her something of mine, promising me something of hers in exchange. I recited whatever came into my head, and she replied with a poem in the same style and of a beauty which I praised as it deserved, pretending to believe that she was the author of it. Ciaccheri, who had been her teacher, seeing that I could not believe the girl was so clever, suggested bouts-rimés.[76] It was the pretty sister who proposed the rhymes, and, all four working at the same time, it was the ugly one who, having finished, was the first to put down her pen. The rhymes were for a sonnet. The girl's sonnet, in verses of eight syllables, was the prettiest; I am astonished, and, still doubting, I compose an improvisation in her honor, and I present it to her written down; she returns the eulogy immediately on the same rhymes, and at that I become serious. I ask her her name, and she replies that, both as a shepherdess in the Arcadian Academy and as her family name, she is Maria Fortuna.[77]

"What! You are she?"

I had read some stanzas of hers in praise of Metastasio, which she had had printed. I tell her so, she rises and fetches the reply which the immortal poet had sent her in his own hand. Overcome with admiration, I no longer talk to anyone else, and all her ugliness vanishes. If I had had a delicious conversation with the Marchesa that morning, my conversation with Maria Fortuna turned my head. Going back to my inn with Ciaccheri, I thanked him again and again for the pleasure he had given me to enjoy. She was a girl in whom he had happened to discover poetic genius, and in three years he had taught her all that she knew. I asked him if she improvised as Corilla did, and he said that she wanted to but that he would not let her do it, for, he said, it would be a shame to spoil the girl by indulging her in it.

Supping with me, Ciaccheri had no difficulty in persuading me that he would spoil his pupil if he let her improvise, for I was of the same opinion. The intelligence of a poet, called upon to discourse in verse on some subject without first meditating on it and deciding upon the heads of his argument, cannot produce good things except by chance, for though his mind pursues the subject he has been given to discuss, he usually finds himself led astray by the rhyme, to which he is enslaved despite his great knowledge of the language in which he is speaking. He finds himself obliged to use the first rhyme which chance offers him, and not having time to look for one which will more properly express his thought, he cannot say what he wanted to say, and he says what he did not want to say and what he would not have said if he had been composing pen in hand. Improvisation enjoyed some reputation among the Greeks only because Greek poetry, like the Latin, rejected rhyme. It was just tolerated in prose. But that did not lead to our great Latin poets' being willing to speak in verse; they could only produce lifeless ones, of which they were ashamed afterward. Horace often spent a sleepless night in order to say in a vigorous verse the thing he wanted to say, and when he had found it wrote it on the wall and went to sleep content and at peace. The verses that cost him nothing were the prosaic ones which he uses in masterly fashion in several of his Epistles. We can learn from this that the Latin poets like the Greeks heard the quantity of the first syllable in all their words, even in dissyllables —a truth which we cannot conceive, for we know perfectly well that sine is a word of two short syllables; but we do not know the reason for it when we consider that we could not pronounce it otherwise if its two syllables were long.

I have written this discourse because it belongs entirely to the Abate Ciaccheri, the learned and charming poet. He confessed to me that he was in love with his ugly pupil, and that he would never have expected to fall in love with her when he began teaching her to compose verses. I told him that I could easily believe it, for sublata lucerna ("when the lamp has been taken away");[78] but he laughed.

"No sublata lucerna," he said; "it is with her face that I fell in love, for it is inseparable from her."

I believe that a Tuscan can more easily write in beautiful poetic language than an Italian from another province, since he has the beautiful language from his birth, and the language spoken in Siena is dainty, more copious, more graceful, and more energetic than the Florentine, though the latter claims the first place and indeed holds it because of its purity, which it owes to its Academy,[79] as it does its richness, which is the cause of our treating subjects much more eloquently than the French do, for we have a choice among many synonyms; whereas it would be hard to find a dozen in the language of Voltaire, who laughed at those of his countrymen who said that it was not true that the French language was poor, for it had all the words it needed. He who has only what he needs is poor; and the obstinacy of the French Academy in refusing to adopt foreign words proves nothing except that pride goes with poverty. We continue to take all the words which please us from foreign languages; we like to grow constantly richer; we even take pleasure in stealing from the poor: such is the character of the rich.

The Marchesa Chigi gave us a choice dinner in her pretty house, the architect of which had been Palladio.[80] On our way there Ciaccheri had warned me not to mention the pleasure I had enjoyed the evening before at La Fortuna's; but at dinner the Marchesa said to him that she was sure he had taken me there, and he did not have the face to deny it. After that I did not conceal from her all the pleasure I had had there; and I pronounced a splendid eulogy on his pupil's great talent.

"Stratico," she said to me, "admires it as you do, and, having read something of hers, I certainly give her all the praise she deserves; it is a pity that one cannot go to their house except secretly."

"Why is that?" I asked, a little taken aback.

"What!" she said to Ciaccheri, "didn't you tell him whose house it is?"

"I did not consider it necessary, for her father never shows himself, or even her mother."

"I can well believe it, but it makes no difference."

"Who, pray," I asked, "are her father and mother? He's not the executioner, I imagine."

"He's worse. He's the Bargello.[81] You can see that it is not possible for a foreigner to come here and at the same time to frequent that house, where he will never find decent company. It is certainly not a prejudice, for honest as the Bargello may be, he must always be the man of his trade, and no communication between his house and decent houses is permissible."

I saw Ciaccheri a little mortified by this discourse, which was not without justification, and I thought it my part to say that I would not go there again until the eve of my departure, to take leave of the charming family, which one would never believe to be that of a man of such an occupation.

The Marchesa then said that his daughter, the pretty one, had been pointed out to her in the street, and that she had really thought her ravishingly beautiful; she added that it was a pity that a girl of such great beauty, and of irreproachable morals, could only hope to be married in another city to a man of her father's trade. I said that I had known a certain Coltellini,[82] the son or brother of the Bargello of Florence, and that I would write to him to propose the marriage; and the Marchesa declared that it would be suitable. This Coltellini, whose acquaintance I had made at Calzabigi's in Vienna, was endowed with the rarest qualities. I have been told that he is dead. Nothing is more odious in all Italy than a Bargello, except in Modena, where the spineless nobility frequent his house and take pot luck with him; which is surprising, for a Bargello must by his profession be a spy, a liar, untrustworthy, a scoundrel, and everyone's enemy, for the scorned hate the scorners.

As the result of these conversations I spent the whole of my week in Siena with the Marchesa Chigi and Ciaccheri, who introduced me to all the Professors. The anatomist Tabarrani[83] made me a present of his book, and I gave him mine. In Siena a Count Piccolomini,[84] if I remember rightly, was pointed out to me; he was a wit, well read, and most likable, but an oddity because he spent six months of the year at home without ever going out or receiving visitors or speaking to anyone, even his servants, always reading and writing; but he made up for it during the other six months, which he spent in company of all sorts, talking from morning to night. He was a Chevalier of St. Stephen,[85] and he may still be alive.

The Marchesa promised me she would come to Rome during the summer, where she had a more than intimate friend in Bianconi,[86] who had given up the practice of medicine to become Chargé d'Affaires for the Court of Saxony. She did come to Rome, but I did not see her. On the day before I left, the coachman who was to take me to Rome alone, and who, having made that agreement with me, could not dispose of the other seat in his calèche without my permission, came to ask me if I wanted a traveling companion, who would save me three zecchini.

"I want no one."

"You are keeping me from earning a zecchino, and you are making a mistake, for it is a pretty girl, who has just arrived."

"All alone?"

"No indeed. She is with a gentleman who has a horse and who wants to ride it to Rome."

"Then the girl arrived here with someone?"

"No indeed, she arrived on horseback too, and she does not want to ride any farther. She was exhausted and went straight to bed. Her gentleman will give me four zecchini to take the lady to Rome. Do it. I am a poor man."

"Then her gentleman will ride along with us at a slow pace."

"Let him ride as he chooses, it makes no difference to me, or to you."

"You say she is young and pretty?"

"So I hear, I have not seen her.'

"What sort of man is her companion?"

"A good-looking man who scarcely speaks Italian."

"Has he sold the horse on which the young lady arrived?"

"No, for it was hired, and the peasant who owned it has already left."

' What luggage have they?"

"He has only a small trunk; he will spare his horse by putting it behind the carriage."

"I will decide nothing before I talk with him, for the whole thing seems strange to me."

"I will tell him to come and talk with you."

In comes a young Frenchman in uniform, spruce, cocky, not unprepossessing, who tells me just what the coachman had told me, and ends by saying he is sure I will not refuse to take his wife with me.

"Your wife, Monsieur?"

"Oh, thank God you speak my language! Yes, my wife, who is English and not at all demanding. She will be no trouble to you."

"Very well. I should not want to delay my departure. Can she be ready at five o'clock?"

"You can be sure of it."

The next morning at the appointed hour I see her in the carriage. I pay her a brief compliment; I sit down beside her, and we set off.

CHAPTER VIII

Miss Betty. Count de l'Étoile. Sir B. M. made to see reason.

IT WAS the fourth adventure which I had had of this kind, and which was not unusual if one was traveling alone and in a hired carriage; but this one seemed more like something out of a romance than the three others. I had about two hundred zecchini, and I was forty-five years old; I still loved the fair sex, though with much less ardor, much more experience, and less courage for daring enterprises, for, looking more like a father than a lover, I believed I no longer had rights or justifiable claims. The young woman beside me was perfectly charming, very nicely dressed in the English style, blonde, rather thin, with small breasts which a gauze gorget allowed me to glimpse, a childish timidity which expressed itself in fear of discommoding me, a noble, delicate countenance, and a modesty of manner which was almost virginal.

"I hope, Madame, that you speak French."

"And a little Italian too, Monsieur."

"I am very fortunate that Fate has appointed me to escort you to Rome."

"Perhaps I am more fortunate than you."

"I was told that you arrived on horseback."

"Yes. It was foolish, and I shall never do it again."

"I should think your husband should have sold his horse and accompanied you in a two-seated soufflet[1] like this one."

"He cannot sell the horse. He hired it at Leghorn, and he has to deliver it in Rome to an address which he was given. From Rome we shall go to Naples together by carriage."

"You enjoy traveling."

"Very much, but much more comfortably."

So saying, the beautiful little blonde, whose white face showed not the slightest sign that there was blood in her veins, went red to the ears. Sure that I had troubled her beautiful soul, I begged her pardon and I fell silent. I spent an hour and more thinking of the young creature, in whom I was beginning to take a violent interest, but, knowing myself, I held myself in check. I knew that my impulse did not spring from virtue, and, despite the very questionable circumstances under which we had met, I waited to see things more clearly at Buonconvento,[2] where the coachman had told me we should dine, and where the lady's horseback-riding husband was to wait for us.

We arrived there at exactly ten o'clock. Coachmen in Italy never drive at more than a walk; one can travel faster on foot. They make only three miles an hour;[3] one is bored to death, and when the weather is hot one falls ill if one does not stop for five or six hours at the height of the day. The coachman told me that, not wanting to go farther than San Quirico,[4] where the inn was very good, he would not leave until four o'clock. So we had six full hours before us to rest and to shelter ourselves from the heat in a room which faced north.

The lady, astonished not to see her husband, kept looking about for him. I ask where he is, and the innkeeper tells us that he had had his horse fed a measure of oats, meanwhile eating a pigeon and drinking a glass of wine, and had ordered him to tell us that he would go on to wait for us at San Quirico, where he would have a good supper prepared for us. This seems to me a trifle odd, but I let it pass as the sort of thing Frenchmen do. But the lady thinks it rude, she tells me so, she begs me to excuse the thoughtlessness of a man who, having met me only the evening before, treated me as if I were an old friend.

"It is a mark of your husband's confidence in me," I replied; "I cannot take offense at it; it is very French."

"You are right; for it is certainly not English."

The innkeeper asks me if it is the coachman who pays for my food or I, and I reply that it is I. The young woman uneasily asks the innkeeper to go and ask the coachman if he is obliged to feed her. The innkeeper comes back with the coachman, who, to convince the lady that he is under no such obligation, takes from his pocket the agreement her husband had made with him. I read it, and I see that it is signed "Count de l'Étoile,"[5] who undertakes to pay him four zecchini, two on leaving Siena and two more on arriving in Rome, in return for conveying his wife the Countess there in five days. There is no stipulation that the coachman shall pay for her meals. Enough said, the innkeeper knows what his situation is, they both leave. No sooner have we entered the room than the charming lady begs me to ask the innkeeper to prepare dinner only for me, for, having supped too heavily, she should go without dinner.

I see it all instantly, and, divining how ashamed the girl must feel to be treated in this way by the man who called himself her husband, I undertake to put her at ease by marshaling all the powers of sympathy in words which only friendship can find and utter.

"Madame, I divine that you have no money with you, and I beg you not to deprive yourself of dinner for that reason. Your husband the Count will repay me, if he insists on it. You must understand that if I told the innkeeper to prepare dinner only for me, I should dishonor your husband, and you, and myself most of all."

"Monsieur, I understand that; you are right. You must let the innkeeper prepare dinner for two, but I will not dine. I already feel ill, and I beg you to permit me to lie down on the bed."

"I am more than sorry to hear it, but pray make yourself comfortable. This room is excellent, I will have the table set in the other; lie down if you wish and sleep if you can. I will order dinner served three hours from now, I hope that you will be feeling better. Forgive your husband this little oversight too."

Not leaving her time to answer me, I went out, I shut her door, and I went to tell the innkeeper what I wanted to eat at three o'clock. He was intelligent; I taught him how to make a pudding,[6] and to broil slices of fillet of beef on a grill. After that I went and lay down too. The Englishwoman, whose figure I had not seen before I got into the carriage, was a beauty. Her self-possession was perfect; her distress, her shame had won me over completely. I felt that I should certainly fight a duel with her self-styled husband, whom I no longer believed to be her husband. It must, I thought, be an elopement, a seduction; and, superstitious as always, I was sure that it had been her guardian angel who had sent me to protect her from I knew not what, to rescue her, to take care of her, to save her from the insults to which brutality, avarice, and her situation could subject her. Thus did I foster my budding passion. I laughed at the name "Count de l'Étoile," and when I considered that the adventurer might well have abandoned the girl to my care for ever, I thought it a little too serious; but I felt sure that I would never abandon her. With these romantic ideas, I fell asleep.

It was the innkeeper's wife who woke me by saying softly that three o'clock had struck. I told her to wait a little longer before serving dinner, and I go quietly to see if the Englishwoman is asleep. And asleep she was; but a slight noise which the door made when I tried to close it woke her. She asked me if I had dined, I replied that if she did not come to the table I did not care to dine, and that I hoped that, after sleeping five hours, she felt better. She said very sweetly that she would come, and I went out to order dinner served.

She ate little, but with a good appetite, astonished to find two English dishes, and the pudding made with good butter. She asked the innkeeper's wife if the cook was English, and, when she answered that the cook was I, she showed, though saying nothing, that she was overcome with gratitude. She became gay, she congratulated me on my appetite, she drank when I did, but sparingly and always doing justice to the excellent Montepulciano[7] which the innkeeper gave us, as well as to the Montefiascone.[8] I was tipsy, and she was not, for she only sipped while I emptied glasses. She spoke to me in the Italian she had learned during the six months she had spent in Florence; she told me that she had been born in London, that she had learned French in school, and I thought I should die for joy when, on my asking her if she knew La Cornelys, she answered that she had known her daughter Sophie at the school to which they had both gone, but not her mother.

"Tell me if Sophie has grown tall."

"No. She's short, but very pretty, and full of talent."

"She must be seventeen years old[9] now."

"Yes, just my age."

With these words she stops, she lowers her eyes, and she blushes.

"Do you feel ill?"

"Not at all; I'm afraid to tell you that Sophie is the very image of you."

"Why should you be afraid? I've been told so more than once. It's a coincidence. But it's been a long time since you saw Sophie, hasn't it?"

"A year and a half. She was going back to her mother's on Soho Square to be married, I heard; I don't remember to whom."

"You have told me a very interesting piece of news, Madame."

The innkeeper comes in with the bill, on which I see three paoli[10] which the rider had expended for himself and his horse.

"He told me," says the innkeeper, "that you would pay."

The English beauty blushes, I pay, and we leave. Her blushing gave me the greatest pleasure; it convinced me that she was not an accomplice in her husband's practices. I was dying to learn by what chance she had left London, how she could have become the wife of a Frenchman, how she had left Leghorn without luggage, what she was going to do in Rome; but I feared to embarrass her by asking her questions; for, if she had wanted to, she could have told me her story, at least in brief, when she told me that she had last seen Miss Cornelys a year and a half before. Having three hours to spend before we reached San Quirico, I got her to talk about my daughter Sophie. When she said that she had lived with Sophie for a whole year in the same school, I asked her if Miss Nancy Stein was still there. The reader may remember that she had dined with me, a charming child ten or eleven years old whom I had devoured with kisses and whose father had given my daughter a ring.[11]

On hearing Nancy's name she sighed, saying that she was there when she had entered the school, but that she had left seven or eight months later.

"Was she still pretty?"

"A perfect beauty; but beauty is often but a fatal gift of nature which only spurs men on to make the innocent possessor of it unhappy. In eight months Nancy became my intimate friend; we loved each other dearly; our sympathy perhaps arose from the fact that the same destiny was setting the same snares for us. Nancy, the tender, sincere Nancy, is perhaps unhappier than I am."

"Why do you say unhappy? Can you complain of your destiny? Can you be unhappy with the beautiful letter of recommendation which nature has given you?"

"Alas, Monsieur! Let us talk of something else, I beg you."

I see her emotion in her eyes. I silently pity her, and, becoming more and more interested in her, I lead her back to the subject of Miss Nancy.

"Should you consider yourself at liberty to tell me why you think Nancy may have become unhappy?"

"She went away with a young man with whom she had fallen in love, unable to hope that she could ever be his with her father's consent; and after that nothing was heard of her; you see that my love for her cannot but make me fear."

"You are right. I feel that I would sacrifice myself for her if I found her in need of help."

"Where did you meet her?"

"In my own house. She was only twelve years old. She dined there, and her father came there to eat oysters with her."

"I know about that. He gave Miss Cornelys a pretty ring. Ah, Monsieur, it is you! If you knew how often I have heard Sophie talk about you! Nancy loved you as much as she loved her father. She congratulated Sophie on your fondness for her. I heard her say that you had gone to Russia, and that afterward you had fought a duel with a general in Poland. Is that true? Would that I could send my dear friend Sophie news of you! Alas, I cannot hope to do so now!"

"It is all true, Madame; but why can you not hope for so trifling a pleasure as sending news of yourself to anyone you please in England? I am most keenly interested in you; trust me, and you can send your news to anyone you choose.''

''I am infinitely obliged to you.''

After this expression of gratitude, she fell silent, and I left her to her thoughts. At seven o'clock we arrived in San Quirico, where the Count de l'Étoile came to the carriage and embraced his wife most joyfully and lovingly, giving her countless kisses in public; which made all the bystanders believe that she was his wife and that I must be her father; the alternative would have been that she was a trollop and I could only be her pi . . .[12] At this greeting from the Count I see the young Englishwoman looking very happy and satisfied and meeting all his ardor halfway; she does not reproach him, she goes upstairs with him, giving not the least sign that she remembers all the politeness I had shown her. I attribute it to love, to youth, and to a certain thoughtlessness; it was annoying, but, dismissing the thought, I go upstairs with my night bag. The innkeeper serves us immediately, for the coachman wanted to leave at three o'clock in the morning, in order to reach Radicofani[13] before the heat of the day began. It was a journey of six hours.

We sat down at table, and the supper was excellent; I had no doubt that it would be, for the Count, having arrived six hours before us, had given the innkeeper time enough to prepare it; but what astonished me and made me a little angry was that the young Englishwoman, who appeared to be more in love with him than he was with her, did not even mention me. It was not until the roast that she said that it was not as good as the sliced fillet of beef which she had eaten at dinner. The gaiety, the jests, the horseplay in which the young man saw fit to indulge at table cannot be described. The Englishwoman laughed at the top of her lungs, and I had to laugh too. For a moment I thought he might be a well-born, rich, undisciplined young officer, of the type who treats everything with that kind of levity and for whom nothing is important; I had known any number of such odd characters in Paris—intolerable and at the same time amusing, frivolous triflers yet sometimes dangerous, keeping their honor in their pockets, only to display it at a moment's notice and risk it as the whim took them. On this supposition, I was very ill pleased with myself, for I thought that the Frenchman, treating me too cavalierly, took me for an outright dupe and insulted me while perhaps thinking that he did me honor. Assuming that the Englishwoman was his wife, I saw myself being treated as a man of no consequence, and I did not want to play the role. Inferior though it was, it was obviously the role which everyone who saw me must attribute to me.

Clean sheets were brought, there were two beds, I told the innkeeper's wife to give me another room. The Count would not hear of it, and his insistence was polite, the lady saying nothing; but no less politely I obliged him to let me leave him and his wife together in perfect freedom. I had my bag taken into the next room, and I even bolted my door. I thought it odd that neither of my traveling companions had a night bag. I concluded that all their luggage must have been sent on to Rome. The little trunk must contain the few things they needed, and since they did not order it brought up they were hardy enough to do without it. I go quietly to bed, much less interested in the lady than I had been all day. The change pleased me.

I am waked before dawn by a servant bringing me a light; I dress quickly and, hearing that they are dressing in the other room, I open the door and, without going in, wish them good morning. A quarter of an hour later I hear quarreling in the courtyard. It was the Frenchman talking in broken Italian to the coachman; I open the window, and I see that it is serious. Though it was not yet light, I make out the coachman holding the Frenchman's horse by the bridle, which the Frenchman was trying to wrest from his hands. I guess what is the matter, for I had read the agreement; the driver wanted money, and he was right. I surmise that the Frenchman has not a copper; I expect to see them come up to my room; and I prepare to do my duty without mercy. The Frenchman enters first and says to me:

"This b . . . . .[14] doesn't understand me; however, he may be right. Be so good as to give him two zecchini, which I will return to you in Rome; as chance would have it, I have run out of money; he has nothing to fear, for he has my trunk; but he says he needs the money. Do me the favor, Monsieur; in Rome you shall know better who I am."

So saying, he goes downstairs; he does not trouble to wait for my answer, the coachman does not follow him; hardly believing my eyes, I see him mount his horse in silk stockings and ride away. The lady was there before me, looking nonplused, and the coachman neither moved nor spoke. I sit down on the bed, drying my hands, and, after considering the adventure, I surrender to the hysterical laughter which overwhelms my entire imagination. I see the thing as so amusing, so new, so comical that I cannot take it in all at once.

"Laugh, Madame, I beg you, for, despite my sympathy, your sadness is out of place; laugh, I say, or I will not get up from this bed."

"It is laughable, but I have not the wit to laugh at it."

"At least sit down."

I give the coachman two zecchini, I tell him that no harm will be done if we arrive a quarter of an hour later, and that I want coffee. The Englishwoman's desolate look wrung my heart.

"I understand," I said, "that you have good reason to be sad, and I am even willing to put your sadness to your credit; but I beg you to overcome it during our journey, in which I promise you that I will deal with every contingency. I ask you for only one favor, which I very much need. If you refuse it, you will see me become as sad as you are, and that will not be amusing."

"What favor can I do you?"

"Tell me on your honor as an Englishwoman if that strange individual is your husband or your lover."

"Very well. I will tell you the truth, and gladly. He will not be my husband until we reach Rome, but there he will be."

"I breathe again. He will not be your husband, and so much the better for you. I am sure that he has seduced you; I see that you are in love with him, but I hope you will get over it."

"That is impossible, unless he deceives me."

"He has already deceived you. I am sure he has told you he is rich, that he is well-born, that he will make you happy, and every word of it is false."

"How can you know it is false?"

"As I know a great many other things, which only experience of the world teaches. He is a lunatic, unprincipled, brazen, willful, who may perhaps even marry you; but it will only be to become your master and to use you to support himself."

"He loves me, and I cannot but be convinced of it."

"What convinces you is not love, my dear child, but caprice and libertinism. You see that he does not know me, and he leaves you in my care. Do you think that a true lover can thus abandon the woman he loves?"

"He is not jealous; Frenchmen are not, you know."

"A Frenchman who is a man of honor is no different from an Englishman, an Italian, and a man of any other nationality. Do you think that if he loved you he would have left you without a copper at the mercy of a man who might have threatened to abandon you in the street or have demanded favors from you which would horrify you? What would you do at this moment if I were such a brute? You understand my meaning. Answer me, you are not in danger."

"I would defend myself."

"Very well. I would leave you here at the inn. What would you do here? Learn that, though you are very pretty, and though you have refined feelings, there are men who, pretty as you are, would have nothing to do with you unless you sacrificed your feelings to them, and who, if you continued to act like a woman whose feelings entitle her to respect, would not give you a scudo. The man whom it is your misfortune to love did not know me, and he exposed you to wretchedness and shame. That will not happen, for I am the man you needed; but permit me to tell you that it is something of a miracle. Do you now think the fellow loves you? He is a monster. I am most sorry to see you crying, or rather, to have made you cry; but it was necessary, and I do not repent of having been cruel, for the way I shall treat you will justify me. Know that I find you exceedingly attractive, and that I am concerned for you only because you inspire me with the most ardent desires; but know too that I will not ask you for one kiss, and that even in Rome I will not abandon you; but before we get to Rome I will convince you that the Count not only does not love you but is a scoundrel."

"You will convince me of that?"

"Yes, I give you my word of honor for it. But dry your tears, and let us try to spend the day as we did yesterday. You cannot imagine how glad I am that you have fallen to my charge. It is of my friendship that I want to convince you; if love does not follow, I shall bear it patiently."

The innkeeper brought me the bill for the whole supper, as I expected he would do; but I paid without once looking at the lovelorn girl, I even feared I had said too much to her. Too strong a dose of medicine, instead of curing her, might do her harm. I was dying to learn her story, and I flattered myself that I should manage to do so before we reached Rome. We set off, and we did not speak a word until we came to the inn at La Scala,[15] where we got out.

I thought I should do well to hire two post horses, because going from La Scala to Radicofani with the coachman's horses would take four hours, whereas with post horses it could be done in two. So I told the coachman to go on and wait for us there, and I ordered the post horses for ten o'clock. It was only six o'clock, and I much preferred spending four hours where I was to leaving at once, for I should have overtaken the libertine who had deceived the poor girl. The arrangement greatly pleased the coachman, who saw himself relieved of the effort of dragging his carriage over the mountain and his purse spared the cost of a third horse.[16] The young Englishwoman broke the silence to say that, since I had decided to travel post, it would be better to do so at once, for from ten o'clock to noon the heat would be intense.

"That is true," I said, "but Count de l'Étoile, whom we should certainly find at Radicofani, would not be glad to see me."

"Why so? On the contrary."

A feeling of pity kept me from answering her, for the reason I should have given her would have made her shed more tears. I considered the girl's love literally a sickness which blinded her intelligence; it did not let her see her seducer in his true role of her destroyer, and she hastened to her ruin because she had not strength enough to deny her instinct. To cure her, I could not use the gentle eloquence which persuades; I needed the harsh reasoning which convinces; it was a tooth which I could not extract except with the tongs, feeling no pity for her pain and disregarding the tears it would make her shed. But was what impelled me to act in this way virtue? Was it love for the innocent beauty whom I had before my eyes and whose grief pierced my soul? All that entered in; but since it was more than clear that if I had found her ugly and sullen I might well have left her to die of starvation, it followed that my efforts were only for myself. So farewell virtue! She was a delicate morsel which I wanted to snatch from another in order to gobble it down myself; but I did not tell myself so; when I suspected it, I turned my thoughts elsewhere; in all sincerity I was playing a false role, which I could not play well except by imagining that I was not playing it.

After the coachman left, I invited the Englishwoman to take a walk in a countryside than which poetry can invent none more beautiful. Betty (such was her name) tried to persuade me that the English countryside would be still more beautiful if the grape grew there, and to distract her I pretended to yield to her arguments, the charm of which ravished my soul. She spoke the Florentine language with the oddities and the faults which come from too much stress, which, combined with her English accent, treated my ear to a music which filled me with delight. I languished, seeing her parted lips which I dared not kiss; for that was the goal of it all. Love which wants to praise knows no other language.

We had walked for two hours when, hearing all the bells of the church pealing and seeing the people going there, Betty told me that she had never seen a Catholic service, and I was delighted to give her the pleasure. It was a feast day. She attended the high mass with perfect modesty, doing whatever she saw the others do; no one would have supposed that she was English. Leaving the church, she said that our rite was much more fit to prosper, and to make religion loved, than the English one, and she thought that the English peasant girls were nothing in comparison with those she had just seen, their elaborate attire having surprised her. She asked me what time it was, and, when I thoughtlessly said that I was surprised she did not have a watch, she replied with a blush that the Count had asked her for it to leave as a pledge with the innkeeper who had given him the horse. I at once repented of having asked her such a tactless question, for her blush could only come from a painful feeling of shame. Betty knew that she was guilty, and she was incapable of lying.

We left with three horses at exactly ten o'clock, and a breeze which tempered the heat allowed us to arrive at Radicofani at noon very well satisfied with our journey. The innkeeper, who was at the same time the post master, at once asked me if I would pay the three paoli which he was owed by the Frenchman who had passed through, who had eaten and drunk, and who had paid nothing. As soon as I told him that I would pay I saw that he was less uneasy; but that was not all.

"The gentleman," he said, "beat three postilions with his naked sword, and one of them, who was wounded in the face, has already followed him, and it will cost him dear. He beat them because they tried to keep him from leaving without paying me and without paying at the stable for the oats his horse ate."

"You were wrong to try to use force with him, for he does not look like a thief, and you should have believed that I would pay you when I arrived."

"You are mistaken. There was no need for me to believe it. I have been cheated that way countless times in my life. If you want to dine, your table is laid for you. If your coachman had arrived a quarter of an hour earlier, all would have been well."

I saw that Betty was in despair. Her whole soul appeared in her face, and her silence made me respect her. Far from taking her to task for her lover's vagaries, I tried to amuse her by light talk, and I urged her to dine well and to cheer her soul with the excellent muscat of which the innkeeper brought us a large flagon. But my efforts to cure her despondency would have been vain if I had not summoned the coachman and told him that I wanted to leave as soon as we had finished dinner.

"We shall only go as far as Centino,"[17] he answered, "and we'll be there in two hours. Let us wait till it is cooler."

"Certainly not. The Signora's husband may need help.

The wounded postilion has followed him, and God knows what may happen to him."

"Very well, we will leave."

Betty looked at me, with her face the picture of gratitude, and to give me a token of it she pretended to be very hungry. She had already learned that it was a way to thank me. While we dined, I have one of the postilions he had beaten come up and tell me the story. The scoundrel was a braggart; he admitted that the Count had beaten him with the flat of his sword, but he boasted that he had thrown a stone at him which must have hurt him; I gave him a paolo, and I promised him a scudo if he would go to Centino to testify against his fellow postilion, and he undertook to do so. He instantly began arguing on the Count's side, which made Betty laugh. He said that the wound on his face was only a scratch, and that in any case he had asked for it, for he should not have resisted him. By way of consolation, he assured us that the Frenchman had been hit three or four times by stones, which did not console Betty. I saw that the thing was turning into a comedy, and that nothing would come of it. The postilion, now a partisan of the Count, left at once, and we followed him a half hour later.

But Betty was very much disappointed when, arriving in Centino, we found that the Count had gone on to Acquapendente,[18] that the wounded postilion had followed him, and the postilion who was on our side had gone there too. It was no use my telling Betty that there was nothing to fear, that the Count was no fool and would know how to defend himself, and the more so because his having been stoned proved that he had acted only in self-defense; Betty did not answer me, and I saw that she was in despair. Perhaps she was afraid that, since she would have to spend the night alone with me, I would demand some recompense for the money and the effort I was expending on her. I think, I calculate, I see the truth. I ask Betty if she wants us to go on to Acquapendente at once. At my question her brow clears, she opens her arms, and I embrace her.

Ah, nature! I do not stop to consider from what source the kiss I had received had come; I rise, I call the coachman, who had already put his horses in the stable, and I tell him that I want to go to Acquapendente at once. He rudely answers that I am free to go there by post, but that he will not leave.

"Very well. Order two horses at once."

It was at that moment that Betty, overcome with gratitude, and seeing herself so well paid for a mere kiss, would, I believe, have granted me all that I could have asked, for she fell into my arms. I laughed, enjoying her joy, and, assuring her that I could have no will but hers, I did no more than cover her lips and eyes with kisses. She seemed to esteem me the more for my moderation. The horses were already harnessed to the carriage, and, after paying the innkeeper for the supper which he said he had prepared, we set off. The coachman told us that he would be at Acquapendente too at eight o'clock, for we must leave at daybreak the next morning in order to dine at Montefiascone [19]

It took us only three quarters of an hour to reach Acquapendente, where we found the wild Count, who gaily and happily embraced the unfortunate Betty, who I saw was in ecstasies to find him safe and sound. He at once told us triumphantly that he had given all the scoundrels in Radicofani a thrashing, while he himself had only been hit by a few stones, from which he had adroitly protected his head.

"But where," I asked him, "is the wounded postilion?"

"Drinking my health with the other one; they all asked me to forgive them."

"At the price of a scudo," Betty said to him.

"A scudo? You shouldn't have given it to them. They'll let themselves be beaten all over again."

Before supper he showed us the bruises on his thighs and the sides of his chest; the young scoundrel was a very handsome man. Betty's adoring manner vexed me; but I put up with it the more willingly after the tokens she had given me of the power which gratitude had over her. At supper he talked and acted as wildly as he had the evening before; he insisted that I should not go to bed in another room; but I did so. I clearly saw that I should have embarrassed Betty, who was not yet hardened to the libertine freedom into which the wretch wanted to initiate her.

The next morning the Count told me he would order us a good supper at Viterbo,[20] and that it would be well if I lent him a zecchino so that he could pay for his dinner at Montefiascone. He offhandedly showed me a bill of exchange for three thousand écus which he had in a portfolio. I said that I was convinced of it without reading it.

Betty, after seeing that, despite the tears I had made her shed, she could count on my doing as she wished, had begun to treat me on a footing of friendship. She talked more openly, and she had almost granted me the right to question her freely, reserving to herself that of correcting my mistaken conjectures.

"You see," she said to me at Montefiascone, "that it is only by chance or from thoughtlessness that my lover is without money, for he has a big bill of exchange."

"I believe it is forged."

"That is spiteful."

"I judge it from his behavior. Twenty years ago I should have thought it genuine. If his bill of exchange is on Rome, why did he not discount it in Siena, in Florence, in Leghorn?"

"Perhaps he did not have time enough. He was in a hurry to leave. Oh, if only you knew all!"

"I do not want to know anything, my dear Betty, but what you are pleased to tell me; but in the meanwhile I will tell you that all the things I have said to you are neither suspicions nor conjectures, but truths which follow from all that I have seen.''

''You persist in the idea that he does not love me.''

''He loves you only in a way to deserve your hatred.''

''How can that be?''

''Would you not hate a man who would keep you only in order to live by your charms?''

''I resent your believing that.''

''I can convince you of it this evening at Viterbo, if you are willing.''

''I beg you to convince me, but with positive proof. It will hurt me to the quick, but I shall be obliged to you.''

''And when you are convinced, do you think you will stop loving him?''

''Certainly, for I fell in love with him only because I think him honest.''

''You are mistaken. You will still love him when you have found that he is a scoundrel, for the fellow has turned your head; he has deprived you of the ability to reason. But for that, you would see as clearly as I do.''

''What you tell me is more than unlikely, but it may be true. Show me beyond doubt that he does not love me, and then it will be for me to convince you that I shall be able to despise him.''

''You shall see proof this evening; but tell me if you have known him long.''

''About a month. But we have been together only five days.''

''And before those five days had you granted him your favors?''

''Not even a kiss. He spent every night under my windows, and during the day I never looked out of them into the street without seeing him pass by. Do you think it likely that a young man who does that can be only pretending to love?''

''I admit, my dear Betty, that he loved you, but in the way I have already told you—to make his fortune at the cost of your happiness; and perhaps without even being aware of it, for it is possible that the fellow thinks that prostituting yourself would not make you unhappy.''

''How can you assume that a man whom, after all, you do not know, is such a villain?''

''Would to God that I did not know him! I am sure that, unable to enter your house, he persuaded you to run away with him.''

''That is true. He wrote to me, and I will show you his letter. He is to marry me in Rome.''

''And who vouches to you for his constancy?''

''His love.''

''Are you afraid you may be followed?''

''No.''

''Did he take you from a father, a lover, a brother?''

''From a lover, who will not return to Leghorn for a week or ten days, who has gone to London on business, and who left me with a reliable woman who, though she had no authority over me, would never have let me receive visits from a new lover.''

''Now I see and know everything. I am most sorry for you. Tell me if you loved the Englishman who is to return to Leghorn and if he was worthy to possess you.''

''Alas! I loved him alone until the moment when, after he left, I was in Boboli[21] and saw this Frenchman, who, for good or for ill, made me become unfaithful to a man who adored me and who will be in despair when he does not find me.''

''Is he rich?''

''Not very, but he is well enough off; he is a merchant.''

''Is he young?''

''No. He is your age, a kind, honest man who was only waiting for the death of his wife in order to marry me and take me back to London; and his wife, who is consumptive, may be dead now.''

"How sorry I am for him! Have you given him a child?"

"No. But I must say that God had not destined him for me, for Monsieur de l'Étoile has conquered me irresistibly; he has positively taken possession of my will."

"That is what everyone thinks who has been led astray by love."

"Now you know all, and I am not sorry to have hidden nothing from you, for twice yesterday I found that you were truly my friend."

"My dear Betty, you will find me so in the future too, and you will need me very much; and I give you my word of honor that I will not abandon you. I love you, I have told you so, and I repeat it; nevertheless, so long as you love this Frenchman you will not find me asking to be anything to you but a true friend."

"Very well, I accept your assurance and I promise that I will never hide anything from you."

"Tell me why you didn't bring even a little luggage with you."

"I escaped on horseback, but my trunk, filled with dresses and shifts, will be in Rome two or three days after we get there, together with the Count's. I had it taken from my house the day before I left, and the man who received it, and whom I knew, had his instructions directly from him."

"Good-by to your trunk!"

"Oh, my dear friend, you foresee only evils!"

"It will be enough for me, my dear Betty, if my foresight does not have the power to make them arrive. I shall be happy if I am mistaken. But despite your having come as far as Siena on horseback, it seems to me that you should have worn a cloak and have a few things in a night bag."

"All that is in the small trunk, which I will have brought up this evening."

After dining well, we slept until four o'clock, and at seven we arrived at Viterbo, where we found the Count in high spirits, and where I was to convince Betty that he did not love her as she believed he did. To that end, I began to put on a show of being enchanted by Betty, to congratulate myself in exaggerated terms on my good fortune in having met her, and him on his possessing such a treasure, and him again on his heroism, which even rose above any fear that leaving her in the company of another man might lead to her breaking her conjugal vows. The harebrained fellow thereupon began to go even further than I had done in my praise of him; he said that jealousy was so little in his nature that he could not conceive either how a man who truly loved a woman could be jealous of her or how he could love her constantly unless he saw her inspiring desires in all the men who came near her. He began a dissertation on the subject, and I let him talk on as he pleased, never contradicting even one of his statements. Satisfied with what I had thus learned about my man, I saved the second part of my plan for after supper, for that would be the opportunity I must seize to bring it off.

At supper I got him to drink a great deal, I constantly made remarks which would encourage him to declare his libertine principles, always praising the strength of mind it took to trample on all prejudices; and it was at dessert that I returned to the subject of love and of the various perfections it must have in order to make two lovers truly happy. He laid it down that two perfect lovers must above all do everything possible to further each other's wishes.

"Betty, who loves me," he said, "must procure me Fanny's favors if she discovers that I have a liking for her, and I, who love Betty, must procure her the pleasure of sleeping with you if I find that she loves you."

Betty listened to her lover's extravagances in the utmost astonishment, staring at him and never saying a word.

"I admit, my dear Count," I said, "that your principle is sublime and that it appears to be the only one which could establish perfect happiness on earth, but it is chimerical. All the beautiful and lofty things you have said to me are superb in theory, but impossible and ridiculous in practice. I believe you have great courage, but I do not believe you have enough of it to put up calmly with the certainty that another man was enjoying your mistress's charms. I wager twenty-five zecchini—here they are—that you would not let your wife sleep with me."

"Permit me to laugh. I wager fifty that I have the strength of mind to be present at the performance. Meanwhile I accept your wager. Betty, my dear Betty, let us punish this skeptic; be so good as to go to bed with him."

"You are joking."

"No. Please do as I say. I will only love you the more."

"I think you are mad. I will never go to bed with anyone but you."

At that, the Count took her in his arms and, with the fondest caresses and the most sophistical arguments, tried to persuade her to do him the favor, not so much for the twenty-five zecchini as to prove to an Italian, in my person, how far the daring of such a Frenchman as he could go. He talked to her for half an hour, giving her, in my presence, caresses which she modestly repulsed, for she thought them improper; but Betty, still gently refusing his importunities, told him that he had already won the wager (and perhaps she was right); giving him the fondest kisses, she begged him to stop trying to persuade her to do what she would never do, even under the threat of death. The beast suddenly loses patience, pushes her away, begins to rage, calls her a f . . . . . . fool, treats her to the vilest insults for a quarter of an hour, and ends by telling her that her reluctance was mere hypocrisy, for he was sure that during these three days she had already granted me all that a wh . . .[22] of her sort could grant me.

At these words, seeing Betty trembling, I spring for my sword to run it through his body, but the scoundrel makes off into the next room and locks the door. In despair at having been the cause of the pitiful state in which I saw the charming innocent, I go to her to try to soothe her distress. She was shaking all over, her throat was swollen, her chin trembled, but her staring eyes could not shed the tears which would have relieved her heart. Everyone was asleep in the inn, I had water, and I knew nothing else to do but to bathe her temples and say to her all that I thought could possibly comfort her. She looked at me, she answered nothing, now and again she gave a deep sigh, she seemed to need to cry, but she could not. After an hour of this despair, her eyelids closed, and she sank into sleep, refusing to lie down on the bed despite my urging. So I spent two full hours beside her, watching her sleep, hoping that when she woke she would not be forced to remain at the inn either by the fever which might overtake her, or by convulsions, or by any of the natural infirmities which I feared in the state in which I saw her.

At daybreak I heard her tyrant leave, and I was very glad of it. Betty came out of her lethargy when the inn servant knocked at the door to tell us it was time to dress. He thought we had gone to bed. I asked her if she was able to leave, and she replied that she felt well and only begged me to have tea made for her, taking a sufficient quantity of it from an ivory box which she had in her pocket. I left her there in order to go and make the tea myself, but it proved to be a hard nut to crack. Going upstairs again, I found her in the other room, where she had opened the windows to breathe the air while she watched the sun rising above the horizon. I saw that she was calm, and I thought I could hope that I had cured her. She drank three or four cups of tea, which restored to her face the freshness of which the terrible night she had spent had robbed it. Hearing someone in the next room, in which we had supped, she broke her silence to ask me if I had taken my purse, which I had left on the table. I had forgotten it when I had offered to wager the madman twenty-five zecchini. I also found there a paper, which I at once unfolded. I read a bill of exchange for three thousand écus. The impostor had taken it from his pocket to match my stake; I read it through and I find that it was issued in Bordeaux and drawn on a wine merchant in Paris to the order of a name which was also written on the back of the bill to make it over to Count de l'Étoile. It was at sight, and it was dated six months earlier. Nothing could be more irregular. I take it to Betty, who replies that she knows nothing about it, and who begs me in God's name not to mention the man to her again.

"For pity's sake," she said, "take care of an unfortunate girl who until now has known none but honest people."

I again vowed that I would never abandon her, and we left Exhausted by her grief, poor Betty fell asleep, and I did the same. We both woke very much surprised when the coachman told us we were at Monterosi.[23] He had driven for six hours, making eighteen miles without our once waking. We were to rest until four o'clock, and we were very glad of it, for we had to decide on a course. I at once inquired if the wretch had passed through, and I was told that he had said he would spend the night at La Storta.[24] He had eaten and he had paid. I told all this to Betty, who was looking well, which filled me with joy.

After dining with a fairly good appetite, it was she who said to me that we must again discuss the wretch who had brought her to the verge of ruin.

"Be a father to me," she said, "and do not advise me but command me. I will do exactly what you tell me to do. You have guessed a great deal, and perhaps everything, except that I shall continue to love the cutthroat even after discovering his black character. I can assure you that he fills me with horror.''

''Can you count on your first lover's forgiving you?''

''I think so.''

''Then we must go back to Leghorn. Tell me if you think it sound advice, if it pleases you, and if you feel prepared to follow it. I warn you that if you adopt it, it must be put into execution immediately. Young, pretty, and the honest girl I have seen you to be, you must not suppose that I would consider letting you go alone, or in company with people for whom I could not vouch as for myself. No, my poor Betty, I love you dearly, and the proof which I owe you of the love you have inspired in me is to take you to Leghorn myself. If doing that will convince you that I love you, and that I am not unworthy of your esteem, I am happy, and I ask you for nothing more as my reward. I will live with you like a father with his daughter, if you are reluctant to give me tokens of a stronger feeling which does not come from your heart. Be sure of my good faith. It is my duty to teach you that there are men in the world as honest as the young libertine who seduced you is depraved.''

After my short discourse Betty remained for a good quarter of an hour with her elbows on the table and her head resting on her hands, staring at me fixedly without saying a word. She looked neither sad nor surprised; I was very glad to see her waiting to give me her answer until she was ready to give me a final one. Here is what she said to me:

''Do not think, my dear friend, that my silence arises from an irresolution which would make me contemptible to myself; believe me, it does not. I have judgment enough to recognize both the wisdom of your advice and the beauty of its source. I adopt it; and I consider it a great blessing of Providence that I have had the good fortune to have fallen into the hands of a man of your character, and to have inspired in you a concern for me which leads you to do everything for me that you could do to help a dear daughter for whom you felt a father's affection. So let us go back to Leghorn, and let us leave at once. What has kept me in doubt, and still does so, is how I am to go about making sure that Sir B. M.[25] will forgive me. I am certain that he will forgive me, but the way to it is difficult; for, though gentle, affectionate, and in love, being very delicate on the point of honor, he is apt to yield to the violence which is the first impulse of a pure soul which finds itself outraged. The thing is to avoid that fatal moment, for he might kill me and he would kill himself afterward. You must think it over on the way, and tell me what you consider the best course. I should tell you that he is highly intelligent and that he will not be taken in by any lie. I think he should be informed of the whole story in a letter, without concealing the slightest detail, for disguising the truth angers him; and when he thinks it is being concealed from him he becomes furious. If you are thinking of writing him, you must take care not to tell him that I deserve his forgiveness, for he must be left to decide if I deserve it or not. He will judge of my repentance by the letter I will write him in English, in which he will see my soul and my tears; but he must under no circumstances know where I shall remain in hiding until he writes me that he has forgiven me; after that there will be nothing to fear from him. The slave of his word, noble, and honest, he will live with me another fifty years; but he will never reproach me for my folly. He is a generous soul. Alas for me! How can I have failed him as badly as I have done!"

"Be so good as to tell me if you ever failed him before."

"Never, my dear friend; but I know his whole history. His first wife caused him great unhappiness, he fought two duels in the Antilles, where he was serving in the army; then he married again; but weighty reasons made him separate from his wife. I made his acquaintance two years ago at our boarding school, which he visited with Nancy's friend. My father having died then, and his creditors having seized all his possessions, I had to leave the school, since I could not pay what it cost, and Nancy, Sophie, and all the other girls were distressed, for everyone liked me. Sir B. M. undertook to provide for me and settled a small income on me, enough to save me from poverty for the rest of my life. Gratitude made me fall in love with him. It was I who asked him to take me with him when I learned that he had decided to leave England for some time; my request surprised him; like the honest gentleman he is, he told me that he loved me too much to take me with him and expect it of himself that he would treat me as if I were his daughter. He thought it impossible that I loved him as one loves a lover. You see that his declaration, instead of raising difficulties, removed them. I told him that, in whatever way he loved me, I could only be happy, and thereupon he gave me a written undertaking that he would marry me as soon as the laws would allow him to do so. I never failed in my duty to him."

"Yes, charming Betty, he will forgive you; dry your tears and let us leave. I have friends in Leghorn, and no one can know that I have made your acquaintance. I will put you in safe and honorable hands, where you shall want for nothing, and where I will never go to see you. I promise you that I will not leave Leghorn until I see you restored to the arms of Sir B. M., whom I already love, and, if it turns out that Sir B. M. is inexorable and refuses to forgive you, I promise I will never forsake you and will even take you to England if you command me to do so."

"How can you abandon your occupations for me in this way?"

"I will not lie to you, my dear Betty, to måke it appear that I am more than I am. Nothing summons me to Rome except my wanting to see again the beautiful things that are to be seen there. That is not an occupation; but saving you from ruin is one"

"Then what am I to do for you?"

I called the coachman and told him that I absolutely must go back to Viterbo, where I had left my portfolio on the bed.

"Send a postilion for it"

"I cannot trust one. If he makes off with my portfolio, I am ruined."

"Take post horses, and I will wait here; but you must pay me for the day."

"Here is a zecchino. Order post horses at once; but follow us slowly with your own horses, for we shall leave again early tomorrow morning."

The zecchino instantly persuaded him, the horses were harnessed at once, and at seven o'clock we arrived in Viterbo, where I pretended to be in despair over not finding my portfolio. The maid swore that no one but she had entered the room. I calmly ordered supper, making Betty understand that I must act as I was doing in order to keep the coachman from protesting against taking her back to Siena, since he could consider that she had been put in his charge by her husband. At ten o'clock he arrived with his horses, and he brought up the small trunk as soon as she asked for it. I easily forced open the little padlock which was on the end of a chain, and Betty took out her cloak and a package in which she had four shifts, stockings, handkerchiefs, and nightcaps. The other things belonged to the villain; but I was too curious not to look at his possessions. Perhaps it was all that he owned in the world.

We found old breeches, old stockings, five or six torn shirts, a powder bag in which there were combs and pomade, and eighteen or twenty part-books, all either comedies or comic operas. There was also a packet of letters, which promised to be very interesting, and which Betty said she would read with me. The first notable thing we found was that all the letters were addressed to "Monsieur l'Étoile, Actor," well known in Marseilles, Montpellier, Toulouse, Bayonne, and several other cities in southern France. I pitied Betty. She could not laugh. She saw that she had been duped by a base actor, and her shame over it was bitter. I told her we would read the letters the next day, and she breathed again.

"Be so good," she said, "as to go out until I can get into bed, for at last I can change my shift."

"Whatever you please, my angel, and if you like I will have a bed made in the other room."

"No, my friend, I cannot but love and cherish your company; you have convinced me of your friendship only too well. Without you, what would have become of me?"

I did not come back until she was in bed, and, having gone to her, kissed her, sat down on the bed, and seen that she was not alarmed, I thought she might forgive me if, doing justice to her charms, I tried to satisfy the desires they inspired in me. Either from fear of seeming unjust, or because she felt what she made me feel, Betty showed herself amenable. On discovering this, I asked her if she would make my happiness complete by allowing me to undress.

"Will you still love me afterward?"

A charming answer when it comes from the heart, and whose falsity is apparent when it comes only from the mind. She offered so little resistance to my perfect happiness that she gave me reason to conclude I was making her happy too. Since Doña Ignacia, I had enjoyed only imperfect pleasures, for I had never seen them shared; but Betty gave me a proof of love which left me in no doubt. She sweetly opposed me when she suspected that I wanted to spare her. We had scarcely fallen asleep before the inn servant knocked at our door.

I dressed to talk to the coachman, who thought he was to take us to Rome, whereas we wanted to go back to Siena.

"Listen," I said, "I absolutely must recover my portfolio, and I feel certain that I shall find it at Acquapendente."

"I guessed it, by God! Pay me for the journey as if I had taken you to Rome, and then give me a zecchino a day, and I'll take you to England if you like."

"You have your wits about you, my lad; I will give you six zecchini now, and you shall give me a receipt; and tonight at Acquapendente I will give you another, and I will do the same every evening."

Ink and writing desk were at hand, the thing was done at once. I told him that I wanted to stop in Montefiascone, where I had business; and we arrived there at seven o'clock. The business was the letter I wanted to write to Sir B. M., in which I was to prepare him to forgive Betty by telling him all her unhappy story. Betty sat down to write him in English. I had already decided to lodge her with the Corsican Rivarola,[26] of whose intelligence I had had proof, and who had a beautiful and discreet woman staying in his house. Betty had acquired a look of satisfaction and assurance which delighted me; she told me again and again that she no longer feared anything, and she laughed when she thought of the deceiver who would vainly wait for us in Rome. She hoped that we would meet the carriage which was carrying her big trunk and that we could easily recover it; and when I said that he might pursue us, she maintained that he would not dare, and I agreed with her. In any case, I was prepared to give him a reception which would make him tremble, for there was no question of my doing him the honor to let him draw his sword. I had excellent pistols, ready to give him the treatment he deserved. Before I began my letter, Betty repeated her warning to tell him the whole truth.

"Always excepting the reward which you have granted my fervent friendship."

"Alas! It is the one thing which he must not know."

In less than three hours we had finished writing, and Betty was very well satisfied with my letter. But Betty's was a masterpiece; it could not fail. I was thinking of taking post horses as soon as I got to Siena, in order the sooner to put her in a safe place before her lover arrived. The only difficulty was the mad actor's bill of exchange, which, whether genuine or forged, I must try to find a way to return to him—but how to go about it? We left immediately after dinner, despite the heat, and we arrived at Acquapendente just as day was giving place to a night which we spent in the delights of love, which is always innocent when it is sincere and disinterested. In the morning I learned that a coach from Leghorn, bound for Rome, was about to leave, and Betty guessed that it was the one on which her trunk and the actor L'Étoile's must be. She went downstairs with me, and she recognized it at once. She talked to the coachman much better than I could have done to persuade him to let her have it; but he was not to be moved, and, since the arguments he used were excellent, she had to give in. The only thing she did, with the help of a notary of the city, was to sequestrate the trunk at the Roman customs office for a month, which would give her time to prove her right to prevent its being delivered to anyone who might come to get it. The notary had the order of sequestration legalized by the city magistrate, and the driver had to accept it and give a receipt for it. He also assured us that he had not received any other trunk from the same sender, which convinced us that the actor was a beggar whose only possessions were those we had seen in the small trunk.

After this achievement, Betty became perfectly charming. She saw herself able to make amends for all the wrongs which her misguided love had made her commit. I congratulated her on so quickly being cured of a passion which had completely deprived her of her reason. She shuddered when she recollected the monster. However, she told me that she would not have come to her senses and been convinced that he did not love her, if the wretch had not finally told her that she was a mere hypocrite and that he was sure she had granted me everything that such a wench as she could not have refused me.

"It was then," she said, "that I saw the monster in all his ugliness, and that I expected to see him fall, run through by your sword. I would have helped you to pierce his heart, if that had been necessary. So he did well to take to his heels. But it's better that it did not happen, for now we should be in a most grievous quandary. I am sure that the scoundrel won't dare to show his face again, either to you or to me."

We arrived in Radicofani about ten o'clock, and we busied ourselves adding to the letters which were to make Sir B. M. see reason. We were at the same table, Betty on one side, facing the door, which was shut, and I on the other side, with my back to the door and so close to it that anyone who opened it to come in could see me only by looking around it. Betty was fully dressed and very modestly; but I, having taken off my coat, was in shirt-sleeves—the heat was torrid. However, at that season I could have been as I was in the presence of the most respectable of women.

I hear heavy steps in the hall, my door is opened, and the man who comes bursting in, seeing Betty, says:

"There you are!"

But I do not give him time to turn and see me. I take him around the chest, pinning his arms, just at the moment when, seeing me, he would have fired the pistol in his right hand at me. As I spring on him, the impact shuts the door, and just as he was shouting to me, "Let me go, traitor!" and struggling to free himself, Betty fell on her knees before him, saying, "You are wrong, he is my savior!"

But Sir B. M., whose fury deprived him of both hearing and reason, kept saying, "Let me go, traitor!" and struggling, while, as long as he still held the pistol, I would have died before I would let him go. Trying to escape from my arms by force, he fell, and, naturally, I fell on top of him. Outside there was a noise of people trying to get in, but they could not, for we had fallen in front of the door. Betty bravely snatched the pistol from his hand, whereupon, seeing that his other hand was empty, I let him go, saying, "You are wrong," while Betty kept repeating, "He is my savior, calm yourself, listen."

"What do you mean by 'your savior'?"

At that Betty takes the letter which I had in front of me, hands it to him, tells him to read it, and the Englishman, without getting up, begins to read. At that, sure of the outcome, I get up, I open the door, I tell the innkeeper to serve dinner for three and to leave and take his people with him.

CHAPTER IX

Rome. The perfidious actor punished. Lord Baltimore. Naples. Sarah Goudar. Betty's departure. Agata. La Callimena. Medini. Albergoni. Miss Chudleigh, Duchess of Kingston. The Prince of Francavilla. The swimmers.

FALLING DOWN with the Englishman, I had struck my left hand so violently against the leg of the table that I had made a deep cut on the back of it at the joint of my fourth finger. Blood was coming out as if the vein had been opened by a surgeon. Miss Betty helped me to wrap up my hand in a handkerchief and tie it very tightly, while Sir B. M. read my letter with the utmost attention. The girl's confidence that her lover would come back to his senses pleased me greatly. I took my night bag and my coat and went to the next room to change my shirt and get dressed. I was the happiest of men, seeing that the thing had taken a turn which left me with nothing to fear for Betty. I was not at all vexed to find myself at the end of an amour whose sweets I had only begun to taste. My certainty that I had given her back a happiness which she had lost made up to me for all the distress I knew I should suffer from leaving her.

I had already been dressed for half an hour, and I still heard her talking forcefully to her lover, who answered her at intervals; they were speaking English, and I did not understand what they were saying, but their dialogue was calm. I thought I should not go in. After a long silence, he knocked lightly on my door, he came in, looking sad and mortified, and saying magnanimously that he clearly saw I had saved Betty, and, what was more, had cured her of her aberration.

"I could not guess," he said, "that the man I should find with her would be her savior, nor that the carriage which I saw here, and in which I was told that a young lady and a man had arrived, had come from Rome. If I had been told that, I would not even have come upstairs. I come up, I see Betty, I have no more doubts, you very sensibly catch hold of me, for, if you had delayed even an instant, my seeing you and killing you would have been simultaneous. And now I should be the unhappiest man alive. God be praised that you were not sitting where Betty was. Be my friend, Monsieur, and forgive me for my mistake."

At that I embraced him cordially, assuring him that what he had done was exactly what I should have done myself in his place. We went back to the other room, where Betty was sitting beside the bed in tears. We remained there for more than a quarter of an hour, saying nothing, while Sir B. M. carefully read my long letter over again. Since my hand was still bleeding, I sent for a surgeon, who, to stop the flow of blood, had to put on a compress and a bandage and make a sling from two handkerchiefs. The cut had severed the vein, but there was no danger. Betty continuing to weep, I took the liberty of telling Sir B. M. that she fully deserved his forgiveness.

"What, Monsieur! Do you think I have not forgiven her already? I should be the most savage of men if I did not know that she deserved it. My poor Betty! She saw her error as soon as you convinced her of the truth. I am sure that her tears have their source in nothing but the grief she feels at having had the weakness to commit a crime for which she cannot forgive herself. In three or four days you cannot have learned to know her as I know her.''

At these words she sprang up and, clasping the angelic man to her bosom, gave way so completely to her emotion that I have never seen repentance shed such a flood of tears. Sir B. M. could not hold back his, and at that I gave in and let mine flow, though I could not keep from varying them from time to time with a little laugh when the happy ending to the tragedy rejoiced my soul. Sir B. M. pleased me when, analyzing our situation, he declared that our tears, since they sprang solely from virtue, could not but be closely allied to laughter. He laughed when he saw his coat all stained with blood. It was of pekin,[1] and he at once sent it to be washed. We sat down to the table where, Sir B. M.'s caresses having calmed his mistress, she ate and pleased her lover by drinking all the muscat he pressed on her. As he was no longer in a hurry, he said that we might as well stay in Radicofani until the next day, for, having ridden fifteen stages at a gallop, he was exhausted. He had arrived in Leghorn the day before, and, not finding Betty at his apartment, had immediately learned by whom her trunk had been taken to the ''Maltese Cross'';[2] the same man had told him that it had been sent to Rome and that the officer who had sent it, after addressing it to Roland,[3] innkeeper, on the Piazza di Spagna, Rome, had hired a horse, leaving the man from whom he had hired it a watch as security. He had gone there at once and had recognized Betty's watch. Thus made certain that Betty must be either in the carriage which was carrying the trunk or on horseback with the officer, he had not hesitated a moment before deciding to follow them.

''I was sure,'' he said, ''that I would overtake you on the road. I took only a good pair of pistols; but not with the intention of killing my sweetheart. Yes, my dear Betty; my soul's first impulse was to pity you; the second, which will last until it is satisfied, was to blow out the villain's brains. We will leave tomorrow for Rome."

I was happy to see Betty delighted by the conclusion of her lover's story. The thought of revenge rejoiced her soul.

"We shall find him," she said, "staying at Roland's."

At that Sir B. M. looked at me and smiled, his eyes shining with content, holding Betty in his arms, as if he wanted to force me to admire the greatness of an English soul, whose natural strength far exceeded the weaknesses to which it might occasionally succumb.

"I understand you," I said, "and you shall not carry out your plan without me. Let us embrace, but promise me that you will follow my advice blindly. Otherwise I will start at once, I will arrive in Rome before you, and I will save the villain who tried to ruin Betty. Remember that if you had killed him before he got to Rome, it would have been nothing; but if you think you can safely blow out his brains in Rome now that you have recovered Betty, you are mistaken. You could have reason to repent; you do not know Rome and priestly justice. Come, Sir B. M., give me your hand and your word of honor that you will do nothing without my consent, or I shall leave you here and now."

Sir B. M. was of my height, somewhat thinner, younger than I by four or five years, and of a character with which my reader must already be so well acquainted that I need not describe it. The rather overbearing tone of my harangue must have surprised him, but, instantly recognizing the source of it, he could not refuse to shake hands with me. I immediately knew that he was a brother,[4] and his brow cleared. We embraced cordially.

"Yes, dear heart," he said to Betty, "let us entrust our revenge to the friend whom Heaven has sent us."

“I consent, provided that we remain together and always act in concert ”

Thereupon he went off to bed, and I left him with Betty. I went downstairs to pay the coachman for his day and to tell him that we would leave the next morning for Rome.

“For Rome? Then you have found your portfolio? You would have done better not to have come looking for it.”

Seeing me with my arm in a sling, the coachman, like everyone else in Radicofani, thought that I had fought a duel.

Sir B. M. having gone to bed, I spent the whole day with Betty, whose sense of her extraordinary good fortune in having been reconciled with him had left her incapable of any but the most exalted sentiments. She told me that we must remember what had happened between us only to remain good friends until death, without the slightest amorous intercourse, and I consented without much urging. As for her desire to be avenged for the insult the actor had put on her, I made her understand that she must persuade her lover to renounce any idea of violence in such a city as Rome, since it might cost him too dear. I promised her that the day after we arrived in Rome I would have him locked up, which I could do easily and, above all, without causing talk, for otherwise her reputation might suffer. After sleeping until seven o'clock, Sir B. M. woke much less angry with Betty's seducer, and adopted my plan, on condition that he should have the pleasure of paying him a visit, for he wanted to know him. After agreeing on this, and eating a good supper, I went to bed in another room, not without regret

We set out at daybreak the next morning, Betty sitting on Sir B. M.'s lap; but the Englishman could bear the boredom of the slow pace of the carriage only as far as Acquapendente. We agreed that we should do better to travel post to Rome, hiring a carozzino[5] in which there was room for four, on which I at once had my trunk put. In this way we covered in twelve hours a distance which would have cost us three days if we stayed in the same carriage. We arrived there at daybreak the next morning, and as soon as we came to the customs office[6] I gave the chief clerk the notarized document authorizing Betty to recover her trunk. He told us that, after the necessary formalities, he would send it to us at whatever inn we might choose, and it was done the next day. After a polite search of my trunk by two clerks, the postilion took us to an inn opposite the Church of San Carlo,[7] where, after having my trunk taken to a separate room, I begged Sir B. M. to remain calm, assuring him that I would attend to the whole matter in the course of the morning and that we should dine together well satisfied. He replied with a laugh that he was going to bed.

I went straight to the Bargello's.[8] The Bargello in Rome is a person who can do a great deal, who takes on all sorts of business, and who is very expeditious when he sees clearly and when his clients are not afraid to spend money. In consequence he is rich, surrounds himself with a certain ceremony, and has immediate access to the Cardinal Vicar,[9] the Governor of Rome,[10] and even the Holy Father. Having been granted a private audience at once, I laid the whole matter before him, not concealing the slightest detail. I ended by telling him that all we wanted was to have the scoundrel put in prison, and to be certain that he would leave it only to be banished from Rome.

"What we demand," I said, "is perfectly just, and you see that we could obtain it by the ordinary legal procedures; but, being in a hurry, I have come to ask you to take the whole matter in hand, and, to help you to look into it speedily, I offer you the fifty scudi which we shall save in court costs."

He at once asked me for the bill of exchange for three thousand écus and for the entire contents of the adventurer's small trunk, including his letters. I gave him the bill of exchange, taking a receipt for it; as for the contents of the trunk, I told him to send to our inn for it at one o'clock. He assured me that it would all be done in the course of the day, after he had made him admit in someone's presence the principal facts of which I had informed him. He already knew that he was staying at Roland's, and that he had called at the customs office to get his trunk. He laughed when he saw me astonished that he knew all this. He said that the thing was grave enough to send him to Civitavecchia[11] (to the galleys), if we would give a hundred scudi instead of fifty, and I replied that it might be possible. He was very glad to learn that the horse did not belong to him; he told me to call on him at nine o'clock in the evening, when he would certainly have news for me. I promised I would do so in company with the Englishman, which pleased him.

In pursuit of my intentions, I had a great deal to do in Rome, and above all to see Cardinal de Bernis;[12] but I put everything off for the sake of the business in hand. It had become my only concern. So I went back to the inn, where I found a local valet whom Sir B. M. had already engaged to serve us and who told me that after breakfasting he had gone to bed. It was only eight o'clock. Since we needed a carriage, I thought I should speak to the innkeeper, and I was not a little surprised when I saw that he was none other than Roland. I thought the actor was staying at his inn.

"I thought, my dear Roland, that you still had your inn on the Piazza di Spagna."

"I gave it to my eldest daughter, whom I married to a Frenchman who is making a good thing of it; and I took this palazzo, where I have splendid apartments."

"And are there many foreigners staying at your daughter's now?"

"There is only a Frenchman, who calls himself Count de l'Étoile, who is waiting for his luggage, and who has a good horse which I expect to buy."

"I advise you to wait until tomorrow to buy his horse, without telling anyone who gave you the advice."

"Why should I wait?"

"I can tell you no more."

Roland was the father of Teresa, whom I had loved nine years earlier and whom my brother Giovanni married in 1762,[13] a year after I left, as my reader may remember. He told me that my brother was in Rome with Prince Beloselski,[14] the Russian Ambassador at the Court of Dresden.

"I thought my brother could not come to Rome."[15]

"He is here with a safe-conduct which the Dowager Electress of Saxony[16] obtained from the Holy Father through her Ambassador. He wants to have the case which went against him tried over again, and there he is making a mistake, for if he had it tried a hundred times the case would go the same way and he would receive the same sentence. No one sees him, everyone avoids him. Even Mengs refuses to see him."

"Then Mengs[17] is here? I thought he was in Madrid."

"He was granted a year's leave of absence; but his whole family are in Madrid."

"I need a hackney carriage by the day for as long as the foreigners I am with stay here."

"You shall have it."

After hearing all this sufficiently unwelcome news, for I did not want to see either Mengs or my brother, I went to bed to sleep until dinnertime. I was waked for dinner at one o'clock, being told at the same time that someone was waiting to deliver a note to me; it was a servant of the Bargello's, come to take all the actor's belongings. I sent them to him, together with the trunk.

At table I informed Sir B. M. of all that I had done, and he promised to be with me at nine o'clock. We spent the afternoon driving to see some villas, and, after taking Betty to the inn, we went to call on the Bargello, who told us that our man was already locked up and that, if we wished it, such a bad case could be made for him that he would certainly be sent to the galleys. Sir B. M. said that he would first like to speak to him, and the Bargello told us how to go about seeing him the next day. He said that he had made no trouble about confessing everything, laughing all the while and saying that it was a trifle which could bring him to no harm, for the young lady had gone with him of her own free will. He had given him back his bill of exchange, which he had received with the utmost indifference; he had told him it was true that his passion was acting, but that he was nevertheless a man of rank, and, as for the horse, that he was at liberty to sell it, since the watch he had left as security was worth more. I had forgotten to tell the Bargello that the watch belonged to Betty. After paying the worthy representative of Rome's summary justice fifty Roman scudi, we went to sup with Betty, who had already received her trunk. She was very glad to learn that the scoundrel was in prison, but she did not care to pay him a visit. We went there the next day after dinner. The Bargello had provided us with an advocate, who at once made out a document in which he summoned the prisoner to pay the costs of the journey and of his arrest, and a pecuniary compensation to the young woman he had deceived, unless he could prove within six weeks, on the testimony of the French Ambassador,[18] that his title of Count was genuine; meanwhile he was to remain in prison.

We found him holding the document, which had been translated into French for him. The first thing he said when he saw me was that I owed him twenty-five zecchini on the wager I had lost, for he had let Betty sleep with me. On my informing the Englishman of this, he said that it was a lie, but that he knew that she had slept with him. The actor, hearing his English accent, asked him if he was Betty's lover.

"Yes, and if I had overtaken you on the road I would have killed you, for you deceived her and you are nothing but a beggarly actor."

"I have three thousand écus."

"I will put up six thousand which will be yours if the bill is not forged; but you shall stay in prison until the answer comes; if it is forged, you shall go to the galleys."

"I accept your proposal."

"I will speak to the advocate."

We left him and went to the advocate's, for Sir B. M., sure that the bill was forged, wanted to have the pleasure of seeing Betty's seducer in the galleys; but the thing could not be arranged, for, though the actor was willing to hand over the bill, he insisted on being given a scudo a day for his expenses until the answer came.

Wanting to see Rome, since he was there, Sir B. M. had to have clothes made for him, even down to shirts. Betty had everything she needed. Becoming their inseparable companion, I never left them; I put off embarking on a regular life until after they were gone. There was nothing any more between Betty and me, but I still loved her, and I had taken a liking to Sir B. M., whose intelligence and English uprightness made him a pleasant companion. He was thinking of spending two or three weeks in Rome, and then going back to Leghorn; but, Lord Baltimore[19] having arrived five or six days after we did, and being an old friend of Sir B. M.'s, he persuaded him to go to spend two weeks in Naples. His Lordship, who had a pretty Frenchwoman and two menservants with him, undertook to arrange the little excursion, and insisted upon my being one of the party. My reader may remember that I had known him in London. I seized the opportunity to see Naples and my old acquaintances there again; I left with them, we arrived there in two days, and we went to lodge at the "Crocelle,"[20] at Chiaia. The first thing I learned was that the Duke of Matalona[21] had died and that the Duchess his widow had become the Princess of Caramanica. This put an end to my renewing the acquaintances I had made at the Palazzo Matalona;[22] so I thought of nothing but amusing myself and calling on no one, as if I had never been in Naples. Lord Baltimore had been there several times, but his mistress, who had never been there, wanting to see everything, as did Betty and Sir B. M., we went everywhere with our traveling companions, dispensing with guides. His Lordship and I were far better informed than they.

On the day after we arrived I was surprised to see the too well-known Chevalier Goudar,[23] whom I had known in London, come to call on Lord Baltimore. The famous libertine was in Naples, living in style in a house in Posilipo[24] with his wife, and his wife was the same Irish Sarah who had been a barmaid in a beer house[25] in London. Since he knew that I knew her, he had to forewarn me. He invited us all to dine at his house on the next day but one.

Sarah Goudar was not surprised to see me, for he had told her to expect me, but it was I who could not get over my surprise. Seeing her dressed with all the elegance a French or an Italian woman could have commanded, carrying herself well, receiving her guests even better, without constraint but with perfect dignity, speaking Italian with all the eloquence of a born Neapolitan, ravishingly pretty, and finding myself unable to forget what she had been when I had last seen her in London, I was stupefied; she saw it and laughed heartily; she seemed to me to be disguised as a princess; but she wanted me to think that it was when I saw her in London that she had been in disguise. In less than a quarter of an hour we saw five or six ladies of the highest standing in the town and at Court arrive at Madame Goudar's house, as well as ten or a dozen dukes, princes, and marquises, with foreigners from every country. Before a table was laid for more than thirty, she sat down at the harpsichord and sang an air with the voice of a nightingale and a brilliance which did not surprise the company, for they knew her, but which astonished me and my traveling companions, for her talent was amazing. Goudar had done it all. Such was the education he had given her in six or seven years. Having begun by marrying her in order to have an unquestionable right to her, he had taken her from London to Paris, where he would have given her to Louis XV as his mistress if La du Barry[26] had not found a way to forestall her. He had then taken her to Vienna, to Venice, to Florence, and to Rome, and having nowhere found the fortune for which he hoped, he had gone to settle in Naples, where, to launch the fair Sarah, he had made her abjure the Anglican heresy and turn Catholic under the sponsorship of the Queen.[27] The amusing thing is that Sarah was Irish and a Catholic. The conversion was a trick.

What I found strange, inconsistent, and unworthy was that all the highest nobility of both sexes went to Goudar's house, and that Madame Goudar could go nowhere, for she was invited nowhere. It was Goudar himself who informed me of all this before dinner. He could not wait to tell me that he supported himself by gambling. Faro and biribissi supplied all his income; and it must have been considerable, for everything in his establishment was splendid. Invited to become his partner, I took good care not to refuse, certain that I should share in all the profits which I could bring to the association by pursuing an activity with whose rules and principles I was already well acquainted and to which my discreet behavior would lend the proper tone. My purse was rapidly reaching the point of emptiness, and I very probably had no other way of maintaining my accustomed style of life. Having come to this decision, I declined to return with Betty. Sir B. M. wanted to reimburse me for all that I had spent on her behalf, and I was in no situation to insist on being more generous than he.

Two months after he left, I learned from the Bargello in Rome that L'Étoile, released from prison by the intervention of Cardinal de Bernis, had also left Rome; and the next year I learned at Florence that Sir B. M. was no longer in Leghorn. He had gone to England with his dear Betty, who presumably became his wife on the death of the one he had.

As for the famous Lord Baltimore, the suzerain of Boston,[28] he left a few days after they did, bent once again on making a tour of Italy, where he died three or four years later[29] from exposing himself to the pestilential air of August in the Roman Campagna, which at that season mercilessly kills all travelers who, not fearing it, dare to spend the night and sleep there. It is enough to sleep a single night in Piperno or its vicinity never to wake again.[30] Those who have to pass that way, going from Rome to Naples or from Naples to Rome, either do not stop there or refrain from sleeping if they value their lives. Lord Baltimore paid with his life for his English skepticism.

Continuing to stay at the "Crocelle," where all rich foreigners came to lodge, I easily got to know them all, and I did them the favor of sending them to lose their money at the beautiful Madame Goudar's. I was sorry for it, but such is the nature of things.

Five or six days after Betty left, I happened on the Abate Gama[31] at Chiaia, very much aged, but in good health and as gay as ever. After we entertained each other for half an hour with accounts of our respective adventures, he told me that, all the differences between the Holy See and the Court of Rome having been settled by the courage of Pope Ganganelli,[32] he would return to Rome in a few days, but that before he left he wanted to take me to call on a person whom I should be very glad to see again.

I thought of Donna Leonilda, or her mother Donna Lucrezia;[33] or who else could it be? But what a pleasant surprise when I saw the dancer Agata,[34] with whom I had been in love in Turin after I left La Corticelli to her fate! The Abate had not forewarned her, though he could have done so, for he did not take me to see her until the next day. After all the astonishment on either side which unexpected recognitions always inspire, and all the words which spring from the satisfaction one feels at those sweet moments, we calmed ourselves in order to tell each other of our vicissitudes. Agata's story, which could have been very short, took a long time; mine, which should have been very long, took only a quarter of an hour. Agata had danced in Naples for only a year. An advocate who had fallen in love with her had married her; and she showed me four children, and their father, who arrived at suppertime. She had talked of me to him so often that she had scarcely spoken my name before he fell on my neck. He was quick-witted, like every Neapolitan paglietta.[35] He assured me that he was most eager to know me. We went down to the quay to sup by moonlight, and, the Abate Gama having left, I remained alone with Agata and her husband. I left them at midnight, promising that I would go to dine with them the next day.

Though Agata was in the bloom of youth, she did not kindle the least spark of the old fire in me; but such was my nature. In addition I was ten years older. My coldness pleased me. I was very glad to find that I need not fear that the power of love would force me to trouble the peace of so happy a family.

Not being far from Posilipo, where Goudar lived, knowing that there was play there, and having a considerable share in the bank, I go there. It was not an unusual hour. I see the table surrounded by ten or a dozen punters, and I am surprised when I see the banker. It was Count Medini.[36] It had been only three or four days since he had been ejected from the house of the French Ambassador, Choiseul,[37] because he had been caught cheating at play. In addition, I had an old grudge against him. My reader may remember that we had fought a duel, and that I might not have forgotten our difference. He had made his way into Goudar's circle. I glance at the bank, and I see that it is at its last gasp. It ought to contain six hundred once,[38] and I see scarcely a hundred. I had a one-third interest in it. I study the face of the punter who had wreaked this havoc, and I guess everything. It was the first time the sharper had been seen in Goudar's house. At the end of the deal Goudar takes me aside and tells me he is a rich Frenchman whom Medini himself had brought there, that he was able to lose a great deal, and that I should not be distressed if chance had made him lucky the first time, for he would not be so the next. I reply that it was all a matter of indifference to me, for I had told him that I would not have a share in the bank when Medini was dealing; he replied that, telling Medini so, he had wanted to reduce the bank by a third, but that he had taken offense and had told him to leave it as it was, and that if he lost he would repay me the amount of the loss.

"If he does not repay me tomorrow morning, there will be trouble; but in any case it is for you to repay me; for I told you in so many words that I will have no share in the bank when Medini insists on dealing."

"You can certainly claim your two hundred once from me, but I hope you will listen to reason, for it would be very hard on me to have to lose two thirds."

I did not believe a word of all this, for Goudar was even more of a scoundrel than Medini; and I waited impatiently for the end of the game to clear the matter up. An hour after midnight it was all over; the lucky punter left, laden with gold, together with the others, and Medini, affecting a most inappropriate cheerfulness, said that the victory would cost the victor very dear. I at once asked him if he would pay me two hundred once, for I was not in the game, as Goudar must have told him; he replied that he admitted he owed them to me, if I was determined to leave the partnership, but that he asked me to tell him for what reason I did not want to have a share in the bank when he dealt.

"Because I have no confidence in your luck."

"You must see that the reason you give me is specious, and that I might put an unpleasant interpretation on your unwillingness."

"I cannot prevent you from misinterpreting, and what I see or do not see is for me to say. I want two hundred once, and I leave you to enjoy all the victories you may win over the gentleman. You have only to arrange matters with Monsieur Goudar, and you, Monsieur Goudar, will return me my two hundred once at noon tomorrow."

"I cannot return them to you until Count Medini gives them to me, for I have no money."

"I am sure that you will have them at noon tomorrow. Good-by."

Not wanting to listen to arguments which could not but be beside the point, I went home, still considering them clearly a pair of cheats and determined to see no more of the gambling den after recovering my money peaceably or by force. At nine o'clock the next morning I receive a note from Medini in which he asks me to come to his lodging to finish our business. I answer that he should settle the matter with Goudar, asking him to excuse me if I could not go to see him. An hour later he enters my room, and he uses all his eloquence to persuade me to accept his note for two hundred once, payable in eight days. I refuse, saying that I would deal with no one but Goudar, from whom I wanted my money at noon, determined to do everything if he did not return it to me, for he had it only on deposit. Medini raises his voice, saying that my refusal insults him; and I take up a pistol, ordering him to leave, which he does, turning pale and not saying a single word in reply.

At noon I go to Goudar's without a sword but with good pistols in my pocket, and there I find Medini, who reproaches me with having tried to murder him in my room. I do not answer him, and, remaining on my guard, I tell Goudar to give me back my two hundred once; Goudar asks Medini for them, and here the quarrel would have broken out, if I had not prevented it by taking to the stairs, threatening Goudar with unrestrained hostilities which would do him the greatest harm. When I was outside the house, I saw the beautiful Sarah at the window, begging me to come up by the back stairs to talk with her privately. I ask her to excuse me, and she says she will come down. She tells me that I am in the right, that her husband is in the wrong, but that I must wait, for he has no money, and she vouches for it that I will have my money in three days. I reply that nothing can pacify me but the money, and that she will not see me in her house again. At that she takes from her finger a ring which I recognized, and which was worth more than twice the amount, and offers it to me as security; I take it, I look at it, and I accept, making her a bow and leaving her there astonished, for she was in a state of undress in which she had probably never suffered a refusal.

Well pleased with my victory, I go to the house of the advocate, Agata's husband, where I was to dine. I tell him the whole story in detail, and at the same time I ask him to find me someone who will give me two hundred once, keeping the ring as security and writing me a note guaranteeing that the bearer can recover the ring on payment of two hundred once. At that he acts in his professional capacity, having me do everything in accordance with the forms of law; he himself gives me the two hundred once, and he sends a note in my name to Monsieur Goudar, in which he names the depositary of the ring, and sets forth the undertaking by which it will be returned upon payment of the same amount.

After dealing with this matter I recover all my good humor, and I enter Agata's apartment, where I find her with a charming company of men and women and the Abate Gama. Before dinner Agata took me into her dressing room, where, opening a jewel case, she showed me, besides the beautiful girandole earrings, all the other pieces of jewelry I had given her when I was rich and in love with her. She tells me that she is rich, and that, since she owed me all her good fortune, it will make her happy if I will take back everything I had given her; she assures me that what she has proposed had been agreed upon that morning between her and her husband; and, to overcome my scruples, she shows me her diamonds, which had belonged to her husband's first wife; their value was greater than that of mine. Admiring so much generosity and a proposal so delicate and so magnanimous, I reply only by a silence which could not but make her understand the depth of my gratitude and the justice which I did her.

Her husband comes in, Agata shuts the jewel case, and with a pleasant laugh he tells me that I must not scruple to do what Agata had proposed, and, so saying, he embraces me. We go to join the company, which numbered ten or twelve; but the only person I notice among the men is a youth whom at the first glance I see is in love with Agata. He was Don Pasquale Latilla;[39] and he had everything to make him loved and everything to make him happy, for to intelligence he added a sweet and attractive manner. We became well acquainted at table. Among the women I was surprised by a girl of rare beauty. At fourteen years of age, she was already as well formed as if she were eighteen. Agata told me that she was studying music, so that she could earn her living by it on the stage, for she was poor.

"Such a beauty, and poor?"

"Yes, for she does not want to give herself piecemeal, and the man who would want to possess her entirely would have to assume too heavy a burden, for since she has nothing he would have to do everything for her. Men who would bring themselves to do that are very scarce in Naples."

"It is impossible that she has not a lover, for she is striking."

"If she has, no one knows of it. You can make her acquaintance and go to see her. In three or four visits you will learn everything."

"What is her name?"

"La Callimena;[40] she lives on the Largo del Castello del'Ovo.[41] The person who is speaking to her now is her aunt, and I am sure they are talking of you."

We sit down at table, the dinner is of game, fish, and shellfish, all exquisite, with delicious wines, and I saw Agata's heart leap for joy at the thought that Fortune had so favored her that she could prove her happiness to the man but for whom she would never have been happy; old Gama was congratulating himself on having brought me there, Don Pasquale Latilla could not be jealous of the attentions his idol bestowed on me, for he considered them due to me as a foreigner, and Agata's husband showed that he prided himself on having a mind above common prejudices. But amid all the attentions which were showered on me, Callimena, who was across the table from me, caused me distractions for which I could not forgive myself. Dying to find her witty, I often addressed some remark to her, she answered politely, but so briefly that I could not start a subject which would give scope for repartee. The girl's eyes were such a brilliant black that, try as she might, she could neither prevent them from making any man who looked into them fall in love nor keep them from saying more than they said despite herself. For this reason she never let them rest on any man who wanted to awaken their interest.

I asked her if Callimena was her family name or a nickname, and she replied that it was her baptismal name.

"It is a Greek name," I said, "and no doubt you know what it means."

"No."

"It means beauty in a rage, or beautiful moon."[42]

"I am very glad to have learned that I have nothing in common with my name."

"Have you brothers and sisters?"

"I have only a married sister, whom you perhaps know."

"What is her name? Whom did she marry?"

"Her husband is Piedmontese, but she does not live with him."

"Is she Signora Sclopis, who is traveling with Sir Aston?"[43]

"None other."

"Then I will give you news of her which you will not be sorry to hear."

After dinner I asked Agata what entitled the charming girl to come to dine with her.

"My husband was her godfather, and he does something for her. He pays the master who is teaching her to sing."

"What is her age exactly?"

"She is fourteen."

"She is a prodigy. What beauty!"

"But her sister is even more beautiful."

"I know her only by name."

But at this juncture Monsieur Goudar is announced and comes in. He asks the advocate to hear something he has to tell him, and they go into another room. A quarter of an hour later the advocate came back and told me that, having received the two hundred once, he had given him back his ring. So that was the end of the matter, much to my satisfaction. I saw that I had made an eternal enemy, but I did not care. The company sat down to cards, and Agata made me play with Callimena, whose calm put the finishing touch to my enchantment. Her character was like her beauty, completely without artifice. I told her everything I knew about her sister, and I promised I would write to Turin to learn where she was then, and give her the information afterward. I told her that I loved her, and that if she was willing I would pay calls on her, and I was very well satisfied with her answer.

The next day I could scarcely wait to go to her house at breakfast time. I found her at the harpsichord with her music master; her talent was mediocre, but love made me find it superlative. After the master left, I was alone with her. She launched into apologies for her frowzy dress, her inadequate furniture, her inability to offer me a dinner. I said that it all conspired to make her more beautiful in my eyes, and that I deeply regretted I was not rich enough to make her fortune. When I began to praise the beauties of her face, she did not resist a storm of kisses which saluted her eyes, her lips, the roses of her cheeks; she stopped me when my daring hand tried to uncover a bosom of which I saw only half, but, even while resisting, she gave me her lips to assure herself that I should not hold her resistance against her. I accepted the kiss, and by an effort assumed a calm which I did not feel.

"Charming Callimena, tell me the truth and earn my gratitude. Have you a lover?"

"No."

"Have you had one?"

"Never."

"But for a time . . . a passing fancy?"

"Not even that."

"What! Formed as you are, with eyes and a countenance which assure me that your heart is tender, how can I believe that there is not a man in Naples who has inspired desires in you?"

"Not one, for no man has ever tried to inspire them. No one on earth has ever made such a declaration to me as you did a moment ago. That is the simple truth."

"I believe you; and I see that I must hasten to leave Naples, for otherwise I should become the unhappiest of men."

"How so?"

"By loving you with no hope of possessing you."

"Love me, and stay. Why cannot you believe that I will love you? Only restrain your ardor, for you must see that I cannot fall in love with you unless I see that you can control yourself."

"As I am doing now, for example?"

"Yes. Seeing you calm, I think that you are denying yourself in order to please me, and love often follows gratitude."

It was as much as to tell me that she did not yet love me, but that she would come to love me little by little; I saw that to win her heart I must pursue no other course than the one she pointed out to me. I had reached the age when a man begins to have the strength to wait. After kissing her beautiful eyes, and being ready to go, I asked her if she was in need of money; in answer she blushed, and a moment later she told me to go and ask her aunt, who was in the next room.

I go in by myself, and I am amazed to find her with two unassuming Capuchins, who were amusing her with small talk while she sewed; some little distance away three very young girls were also sewing. She starts to rise, I stop her, I ask after her health, I laughingly congratulate her on her company, she laughs too, the Capuchins do not vouchsafe me even a look and remain where they are. I take a chair and sit down facing her.

The aunt might be fifty years old, she was well preserved for her age, she had a frank expression and traces of a beauty which had left her with her youth. I had scarcely looked at her at dinner the day before. Though I am free from prejudices, the presence of the two bearded men, in their monstrous habit, sweating great drops and giving off a more than unpleasant odor, very much annoyed me; I thought their not leaving was an insult to me. I knew that, being men as I was, they must have the same desires as I; but I could not forgive them for the effrontery with which they encroached on my privileges, despite their knowing that I had the right to send them about their business. I saw clearly that my mortifying them would displease the lady, and I felt sure that the two impostors counted on a consideration which I could not fail to show except to my own disadvantage. No one is more adept at such calculations than a priest. After a long acquaintance with the whole of Europe, I can say that I have never seen the regular clergy remaining within the bounds prescribed by their vows, except in France; there I have never found monks at social gatherings; I have never dined in decent houses with priests or bishops brazen enough to eat meat on the days when the Church forbids it to them; I have never seen monks or abbés in public resorts or at theaters except in secular dress. In Italy, on the contrary, in Spain, and in some German cities, priests, monks, and the whole tribe of abbés appear freely in all the places where it would seem that no one should go but those who, having taken no vows, are sure that they will scandalize no one by their presence there.

After being patient for a quarter of an hour, I could not help telling the worthy aunt that I had something to say to her in private; whereupon I thought the stinking monks would leave; but not a bit of it, she herself rose and took me into the next room to hear what I wanted to say to her. On my asking her if she was in need of money she replied that she was only too much in need of twenty ducati del regno[44] to pay the rent of the house. Twenty Neapolitan ducati come to eighty French francs. She was astonished, and full of gratitude, at my unhesitatingly giving her the amount. I went back to the "Crocelle" without giving her time to thank me.

Something which happened to me on the same day is worthy to be recorded. While I was dining alone in my room, I was told that a Venetian hermit, who said that he knew me, had come to speak to me. I have him shown in, and I see a face which was not unfamiliar but which I could not place. Of my height, but thin, gaunt, showing all of his sixty years, with hunger, poverty, and weariness depicted in his every feature, with a long beard, a bald head, a brownish-gray robe hanging down to his heels and fastened by a rope from which hung a rosary, a dirty handkerchief, a hood falling down on his back, a long cylindrical basket in his left hand, and a staff in his right, he strikes me as being not a servant of God, a penitent sinner, a humble seeker of alms, but a man in despair perhaps come to murder me in my room.

"Who are you? I seem to have seen you before; but I cannot pretend that I remember you."

"I will tell you who I am, and I will surprise you with the story of my misfortunes; but first have food and drink brought for me, for since day before yesterday I have eaten nothing but some thin soup at the hospice."

"Certainly. Go down and let them give you dinner, and come up afterward, for you cannot talk to me while you are eating."

My local valet goes down with him to order him given something to eat, and I order him not to leave me alone with the man, who really terrified me. Sure, however, that I must know him, I could not wait to learn who he was. Three quarters of an hour later he came up again, looking as if his face were on fire with fever. I tell him to sit down and speak freely, for my servant would stay on the balcony, where he could hear nothing of what he should say to me. He began by telling me his name.

"I am Albergoni."[45]

I instantly remember him. He was a Paduan gentleman with whom I had been on terms of close friendship twenty-five years earlier, when, Signor Bragadin having granted me his protection, I had given up earning my living as a violinist. The Paduan nobleman had only a very small fortune, but he had intelligence, a strong character, great knowledge of the world, and a splendid constitution able to withstand every debauch in the service of Bacchus and Venus; if his morals were unbridled, so was his tongue, which mocked now the government, now religion; he was brave to the point of temerity, a gamester who did not confine cheating to the bounds of prudence, a disciple of the antinaturalism which long ago brought the fires of Heaven down on the five cities.[46] In addition, the man whom I had before me and who presented me with the veritable image of ugliness had been handsome until the age of twenty-five; but that is not surprising: the way from beauty to ugliness is very short, much shorter than the way from ugliness to beauty. In the first change Nature descends, in the second she rises. It was twenty-five years since I had seen Albergoni, and fifteen since I had heard any news of him. I saw him before me dressed as a hideous hermit. Here is what he told me.

"A club of five or six young men of whom I was one had a casino on La Giudecca[47] where we spent delightful hours without harming anyone. Somebody took it into his head that our gatherings were enlivened by illicit relations forbidden by the law. We were indicted in the greatest secrecy, the casino was closed, and all the members of it ran away except myself and a certain Branzardi. We were arrested. Two years later Branzardi was sentenced to be burned after being beheaded, and I was sentenced to ten years in prison. In the year '65 I was released, and I went to live in Padua, where I was not left in peace. I was accused of the same crime, and, thinking it best not to wait for the bolt to fall, I went to Rome. Two years later the Council of Ten sentenced me in absentia to perpetual banishment. One can bear banishment patiently if one has an income, and I should have had enough to live on if my brother-in-law, who had taken

The Palace in Portici at the Foot of Vesuvius over my estate, did not decide to profit by my misfortune to obtain full possession of it. A lawyer in Rome was ordered to pay me two paoli a day if I would sign an undertaking assuring them that I would never make any further claims. I refused to accept the two paoli on this unjust condition, and I left Rome to come here to be a hermit. It is as such that I have lived for two years, and I am at the end of my tether, for misery kills. Anyone who defies it can only be some wretch who has never experienced it."

"Go back to Rome. I think that with two paoli a day you can manage to live."

"I would rather die than submit to injustice."

I condoled with him, I gave him a zecchino, and I told him that as long as I remained in Naples he could come to eat at my inn every day, and I thought I saw him leave satisfied; but two days later his name was on every tongue in Naples. My valet told me when he entered my room in the morning that the hermit to whom I had had dinner given for two days was lying stark naked at the door of an inn on the Via Toledo.[48] The innkeeper had found him dead, hanging in the room in which he had slept, and, having immediately informed the magistrate, had been ordered to expose him publicly to find out who he was. I quickly dress to go and see the spectacle. I see the wretch who had strangled himself, and who made the spectators tremble. His face was black and livid, and his scrotum was so swollen that he appeared to have a very big hernia. I go to speak with the innkeeper, who tells me that for two days he had supped very well and drunk even better, paying him in advance as was the practice in the case of all mendicants. He took me to the room in which he had killed himself (he did not know at what hour), leaving the door unlocked. He had given his basket and all his rags to the magistrate, and he could not wait to have them come to fetch his body and bury it in the carrion pit. On the floor I see a sheet of paper, I pick it up, and I read my name at the head of eight or ten others, among which was that of Count Medini. After giving us the flattering title of his benefactors, he tells us that, life having become a burden to him, he thought it best to free himself of it and deserve our approbation. In recompense for what we had done for him, he gave us five numbers. I gave the paper to the innkeeper, who received it as if it were a treasure. The death of the wretched madman was very advantageous to the Neapolitan lottery. All the players staked on the five numbers, not one of which came out; but experience has never had power to dispel superstition. Five numbers written down by a man who hanged himself a quarter of an hour later could not but be those which would come out at the first drawing.

I go into a coffeehouse for breakfast, and hear someone discoursing at length on the reason why a man who was determined to commit suicide should choose to hang himself; he claimed that it was a delightful death, and the great proof he alleged was that every hanged man at his last moment had an erection and an ejaculation of sperm. As I left the coffeehouse, I finally seized the hand of a pickpocket just as he was spiriting away my handkerchief. In less than a month I had been robbed of at least twenty handkerchiefs. Any number of rogues live in Naples by nothing else, and their skill is admirable. As soon as the rascal saw that he was caught, he begged me not to raise a row, assuring me that he would give me back all the handkerchiefs he had stolen from me, and he confessed that he had robbed me of seven or eight.

"You have robbed me of twenty, and more."

"Not I, but some of the others. Come with me, and perhaps you'll find them all, and whoever has them will let you have them very cheap."

"Is it far?"

"On the Largo del Castello;[49] but let go of me, for people are looking at us."

The rascal took me to a shabby inn ten paces from Callimena's house, and a minute later he shows me into a room where a very wide-awake man asks me if it is true that I want to buy secondhand goods. Hearing that I want to buy handkerchiefs, he opens a cupboard which looked like a door and he shows me at least two hundred, among which I found ten or a dozen of mine, which I bought for ten times less than they were worth. In the course of the following days I bought several more, feeling restrained by no scruple despite my being sure that everything I bought was stolen. Two or three days before I left, by which time he had got to know me well and concluded it was not in me to betray him, this honest Neapolitan merchant told me confidentially that if I would invest ten or twelve thousand ducati in his merchandise I would make a profit of thirty thousand by selling it in Rome or elsewhere.

"What sort of merchandise have you?"

"Watches, snuffboxes, and rings which I dare not sell here, for they are all stolen."

"But are you not afraid?"

"I haven't much to fear, but I do not confide in everyone."

I thanked him, but I would not even look at his jewelry; I was too much afraid that I could not resist the temptation to buy for ten what was worth fifty. I should have run the risk of somewhere running into the owner of the thing I bought.

Back at the inn, I found that among the newly arrived foreigners were some people whom I knew. Bertoldi[50] had arrived from Dresden with two young Saxon gentlemen whose tutor he was. The young Saxons were handsome and rich and looked as if they were bent on pleasure. I had known Bertoldi for twenty-five years. He had played the role of Arlecchino in the company of Italian actors[51] in the service of the King of Poland, and after the King's death he had been appointed a Councilor with the duty of superintending the opera buffa, which was much to the taste of the Dowager Electress, who loved music. They were given rooms near mine, and we were soon very well acquainted.

The other foreigners, who had arrived at the same time with a large suite of servants, were Miss Chudleigh,[52] who had become Duchess of Kingston, with an English Lord and a Knight whose name I have forgotten. The lady at once recognized me and did not hesitate a moment to accept the homage which I proposed to offer her; an hour later Monsieur Hamilton[53] came to see her, and I was delighted to make his acquaintance. We all dined together. Hamilton was a genius; I have been told that he is now married to a young woman who had the skill to make him fall in love. This misfortune often overtakes men who have managed to guard against it all their lives; age weakens the heart as it does the mind. Marrying is always a folly, but when a man who is getting old is guilty of it it is deadly. The woman whom he marries can offer him only grudging favors, for which he pays with his life, which he certainly shortens; or if it happens that she is in love with him, he is in an even worse situation. He will infallibly die in two or three years. Seven years ago I came very near to succumbing to this folly in Vienna,[54] a qua me servavit Apollo ("from which Apollo saved me").[55]

After dinner I presented the two Saxons to the Duchess of Kingston, to whom they gave news of the Dowager Electress of Saxony, of whom she was very fond. We all went to the theater. As chance would have it, Madame Goudar was in the box next to ours; Hamilton entertained the Duchess by telling her the beautiful Irishwoman's story. The Duchess showed no wish to make her acquaintance.

After supper she got up a game of quinze,[56] with herself, the two Englishmen, and the two Saxons; the stakes being small, not much was lost, the Saxons won; I decided to play another time. The next day we all went to dine at the Prince of Francavilla's;[57] he gave us a splendid repast and toward nightfall took us to a small pool which he had by the seashore, where he showed us a wonder. A priest[58] dived into the water stark naked and swam, resting from time to time without sinking. He used no artificial means to keep afloat. We were forced to conclude that it could only be due to his internal organization. After that the Prince gave the Duchess a very agreeable spectacle. He had all his pages swim naked before her; they were charming boys fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen years of age, all of them minions of the amiable Prince, whose nature made him prefer the male to the female sex. The Englishmen asked the Prince if he would give them the same spectacle with girls as the swimmers, and he promised that he would do so the next day at a house he owned near Portici, where he had a pool in the garden.

My amour with Callimena. My journey to Sorrento. Medini. Goudar. Miss Chudleigh. The Marchese della Pettina. Gaetano. Mrs. Cornelys's son. Anecdote about Sarah Goudar. The Florentines blanketed by the King. My happy journey to Salerno, my return to Naples, my departure thence, and my arrival in Rome.

THE PRINCE of Francavilla was a rich, lavish, extremely intelligent Epicurean, whose favorite motto was Fovet et favet ("He forwards and fosters").[1] He was in favor in Spain, but the King had thought it best that he should live in Naples, because he foresaw that he might easily have initiated the Prince of Asturias[2] and his brothers into his antinatural practices. At his little palace on the afternoon of the next day he showed us his small lake enlivened by ten or twelve young peasant girls, who swam in our presence until nightfall; Miss Chudleigh and two other ladies found the treat as boring as they had found the one on the day before delightful. The English visitors and the two Saxons did not prevent me from paying two visits a day to my dear Callimena, with whom, the more she kept me languishing, the more I found myself in love. Agata, whom I saw every day, was the confidant of my passion, and would have been glad to find a way to forward my desires; but her dignity did not permit her to act openly; she promised to include her in the party one day when we were to go to Sorrento, where I could easily make progress during the night we should spend in that charming countryside.

But before the party with Agata could be arranged, Monsieur Hamilton arranged the same excursion with the Duchess of Kingston, and, since it was to be a picnic, I paid my respects to her by joining it with the two Saxons and a charming Abate Giliani,[3] with whom I became better acquainted later in Rome. We left Naples at four o'clock in the morning in a twelve-oared felucca, and at nine o'clock we arrived at Sorrento. There were fifteen of us, all in high spirits, and all enraptured by the pleasures of the place, which we thought truly a terrestrial paradise. Monsieur Hamilton took us all to a garden which belonged to the Duke of Serracapriola,[4] who happened to be there with his wife the Duchess, a Piedmontese lady, beautiful as a star, and in love with her husband.

The Duke had been banished there with her for two months because he had appeared in public with too fine a carriage and liveries; the Minister Tanucci[5] had intimated to the King that it was necessary to punish a nobleman who, by breaking the sumptuary laws, had set a very bad example; and the King, who had not yet learned to oppose Tanucci's will, had banished the couple to the most delightful prison in all his kingdom; but for the most delightful place in the world to become distasteful, one has only to be obliged to live there. The Duke and his beautiful wife were bored to death. When they saw Hamilton leading a numerous party, they sighed with relief and recovered from their gloom. An Abate Bettoni,[6] whose acquaintance I had made nine years before at the late Duke of Matalona's, came to call on the Duke and was delighted to see me. He was a Brescian gentleman, and he had chosen Sorrento as his permanent residence. With an income of three thousand scudi, he lived in luxury, enjoying all the gifts which Bacchus, Ceres, and Venus could bestow on him. Whatever he wanted he could have, and he could want no more than nature offered him at Sorrento; he was content, and he laughed at the philosophers who said that man could not be so, since he enjoyed moderate but sufficient wealth, had no ambition, and was in perfect health. What displeased me was to see him accompanied by Count Medini, who, after the scene which had taken place at Goudar's, could not but be my enemy. We scarcely bowed to each other. At table we were twenty-two or twenty-four, and we enjoyed delicious fare without needing the offices of a cook, whose art consists in nothing but making tasty what would not be so without it. Everything at Sorrento is delicious—greenstuff, all the products of the dairy, red meat, veal, and even the flour, which gives all the pastries a delicate flavor which is found nowhere else. We spent the afternoon strolling about villages whose tree-lined streets were more beautiful than those of all the gardens of Europe and Asia.

At the Abate Bettoni's house we found ices flavored with lemon, with chocolate, with coffee, and pot cheeses than which nothing more delicious could be imagined. Naples excels in these delicacies, and the Abate Bettoni saw to it that his table was well served. He had five or six young peasant girls, all of them pretty, so nicely dressed they looked anything but servants. Their beauty astonished me, and when I asked him privately if it was a seraglio he replied that it might be, but that jealousy had no place in it, as I was free to learn for myself by spending a few days in his house. I looked at the fortunate man, but with a sigh, for he was at least twelve years older than I. His happiness could not last much longer.

Toward nightfall we went back to Serracapriola's, where a supper of ten or twelve different kinds of fish and shellfish had been prepared. The air of Sorrento never leaves those who live there without an appetite. After supper the English Duchess wanted to play faro; the Abate Bettoni, who knew that Medini was a professional gamester, suggested that he be banker; but Medini declined, saying that he had not money enough. However, the Duchess had to be satisfied, and I offered myself. Cards were brought, I emptied my purse on the table; it contained all I possessed, which did not amount to more than four hundred once. The whole company took gold from their pockets and accepted livrets.[7] One of the Saxons asked for counters, and I begged him to excuse me from carrying him on his word, whereupon his friend gave him fifty ducati. Medini asked me if I would let him take a share in my bank, and I replied that since I did not want to count my money it was impossible. I dealt until an hour after midnight, and stopped only because I had but thirty or forty once left; the two Duchesses and almost all the other punters were lucky, except a Sir Rosebery,[8] who, instead of gold, smilingly staked London bank notes. I put them in my pocket without examining them, while the whole company thanked me warmly for the favor I had done them. Medini did not play. In my room I looked at the English notes, and I found four hundred and fifty pounds sterling, which came to about twice what I had lost. I went to bed very well pleased with my day, determined to tell no one the amount I had won.

The Duchess of Kingston having said that we should leave at nine o'clock, Signora Serracapriola invited her to drink coffee before going on board the felucca. After the breakfast Bettoni and Medini arrived, and the latter asked Hamilton if he might intrude so far as to return to Naples with us; the Englishman replied that his company would be an honor. At two o'clock we arrived at our inn, where, about to enter my room, I was surprised to see in the antechamber a young lady, who, coming toward me with a sad look, asked me if I knew her. She was so changed that she might well have asked me the question, but I had no difficulty in recognizing her. She was the eldest of the five Hanoverian sisters whom I had loved in London, the one who had run away with the Marchese della Pettina.[9] I imagine that my reader will remember the whole episode. My curiosity is as great as my surprise. She tells me that if I am alone she will be glad to dine with me, and I order for two.

Her story was not long. She had arrived in Naples with the Marchese, whom her mother had refused to see. He had taken lodgings with her at a miserable tavern, where he had sold everything she possessed, and two or three months later he had been sent to prison in the Vicaria[10] for seven or eight different charges of forgery. She had been supporting him in prison for seven years, and, being at the end of her resources, and having learned from the Marchese himself that I was in Naples, she had come to ask me, not to help by giving her money, as the Marchese wished, but to use my influence with the Duchess of Kingston to persuade her to take her back to England with her in her service.

"Are you married to the Marchese?"

"No."

"How have you managed to support him for seven years?"

"I have had lovers. Imagine anything, and it will be true. Can you arrange for me to speak to the Duchess?"

"I will mention you to her, and I warn you that I will tell her nothing but the truth."

"Good. And I will do the same. I know her character."

"Come tomorrow."

About six o'clock I went to ask Hamilton how I could exchange the English notes I had won the evening before, and he did it for me himself at the current rate of exchange. Before supper I spoke to Miss Chudleigh about the Hanoverian, and, remembering the five girls, she said that she must have made her acquaintance, for she had come to her with her sister to ask for her protection. She told me she would speak with her and would make up her mind afterward. So I introduced her the next morning and left her alone with her. The result of the interview was that she engaged her to take the place of a Roman chambermaid, whom she dismissed, and took her to Rome a week later, and that winter left to return to England with her. I never learned what became of her.

But when two or three days after she left Naples Pettina begged me in a very well-written letter to come to see him in prison in the Vicaria, where he was, I could not refuse. I found him with a young man whom, since they looked exactly alike, I at once recognized as his brother; but despite their striking resemblance the elder brother was ugly and the younger handsome. Between beauty and ugliness there is often no more than an almost imperceptible point. The visit, in which curiosity played a greater part than magnanimity, did not amuse me: I had to put up with a very long and very boring account of all his misfortunes and of all the mistakes which had brought him to a prison from which he had no hope of being released until the death of his mother, whom he called his bitterest enemy and who was only fifty years of age. He thought he had a right to reproach me for having arranged the departure from Naples of the woman without whom he would die of starvation, for he had only two carlini[11] a day, which were not enough to satisfy his hunger. His brother had been in prison with him for two years because of his kind heart. He had persuaded him to circulate bank notes which he had forged; they had been recognized, he had been discovered to have been the source of them, and he had been sent to prison; he would have been hanged if their mother had not paid; but it was on their mother's complaint that he was being kept in prison, where, like himself, he had only two carlini a day.

What astonished me at the end of his story was a proposal which he made to me with no idea that it was insulting. He assured me that he could forge the signatures of the ministers Tanucci and Di Marco,[12] on the strength of which he tried to persuade me to go to Palermo with papers which he would give me, stay there for only three days, and receive a hundred thousand ducati. He would trust me completely, giving me the papers and the necessary instructions, certain that on my return to Naples I would give him twenty thousand ducati, with which he would pay his debts and get out of prison despite his mother.

It would have been a mistake to take offense at his confiding in me and to pick a quarrel with the poor youth for insulting me by making me a proposal which he could make me only if he assumed that I was a thief; for, being himself a scoundrel and a forger, he was simply treating me as an equal. Indeed he thought he was honoring me with a mark of the greatest consideration. So I declined politely, telling him that, since I had to go to Rome, I had not time to go to Palermo. He ended by asking me for money, but I could find no good reason to give him even a carlino. I left, telling him to change his way of life or to prepare to die on the gallows. My advice made him laugh, but his younger brother was impressed by it; I saw him turn pale and, a moment later, red as fire.

At the foot of the stairs a prison official told me that a prisoner wanted to speak to me.

"Who is he?"

"He's a relative of yours, his name is Gaetano."

A relative of mine, named Gaetano—I thought it must be my brother the Abate,[13] whom some strange chance might have sent to prison in Naples. I go up to the third floor with the official, and I see eighteen or twenty wretches sitting on the floor, singing bawdy songs in chorus. In prisons and the galleys gaiety is the resource of misery and despair; nature provides this relief by the instinct which commands it to preserve itself. I see one of the unfortunates coming toward me; addressing me as "godfather," he makes to embrace me. I fall back at once and I recognize him as the Gaetano who, under my sponsorship twelve years earlier in Paris, had married a pretty girl whom I had later helped to escape from him. I think my reader will remember the incident.[14]

"I am sorry to see you here. How can I be of use to you?"

"By paying me the nearly a hundred écus which you owe me for goods you bought from me on several occasions in Paris."

The thing being completely false, I turn my back on him, saying that prison had apparently driven him mad. I go downstairs and inquire of the jailer, and I learn that he is sentenced to prison for the rest of his life and that he had escaped the gallows only because of a flaw in the criminal proceeding which was to have sent him there. But what surprised me was an advocate who came to me that afternoon to demand a hundred écus which I owed Gaetano, and, to prove that I really did owe them to him, showed me a thick book belonging to his client in which my name appeared under ten or twelve different dates as owing him for such-and-such goods which I had bought from him in Paris and for which I had not paid. I answer the advocate that I owe the scoundrel nothing and that his having written my name in his book was no proof.

"You are mistaken, Signor, it proves a great deal, and the courts in this country are very favorable to poor creditors in prison. I am their advocate, and I warn you that if you do not pay, or do not come to some arrangement today, I will have you summoned to court tomorrow."

I control myself, and I ask him his name, which he writes down; then I tell him to go, assuring him that I will arrange everything in less than twenty-four hours. I at once went to Agata's, and her husband laughed heartily when I told him all that the advocate had said to me. He at once had me sign a power of attorney by virtue of which he became my surety in any proceedings, after which he sent the scoundrelly paglietta who had threatened me official notice that he must now deal only with him. This ended the whole affair. The rabble of chicaning lawers in Naples is extremely dangerous, for the tricks by which they evade the law are beyond counting, especially when they have to deal with foreigners.

Sir Rosebery having stayed on in Naples, through him I became acquainted with all the English people who arrived. They all came to stay at the "Crocelle," we often went on excursions with the two Saxons, and I passed the time very pleasantly; nevertheless, I should have left Naples after the Fair[15] if my love for Callimena had not detained me. I saw her every day, I made her presents, but her concessions to my desires were of the slightest. The Fair was about to end, and Agata arranged the excursion to Sorrento which she had promised me, choosing a three-day holiday so that her husband could share in the pleasure without hurt to his business. Agata asked her husband to invite a woman he had loved before he had married her; for his own part, her husband invited Don Pasquale Latilla;[16] and they did me the kindness to invite my dear Callimena. So we were three men with three women whom we loved, and the expense of the excursion was to be divided equally between the three of us; Agata's husband the advocate was to direct everything. But before the day on which we were to start I saw, to my great surprise, Joseph, Mrs. Cornelys's son,[17] appear before me, delighted to have found me in Italy, as he had expected to do.

"What chance," I asked him, "brings you to Naples, and whom are you with?"

"I am here alone. I wanted to see the whole of Italy, and my mother has made it possible. I've seen Turin, Milan, Genoa, Venice, Bologna, Florence, Rome, and now here I am in Naples. When I've seen everything worth seeing here, I'll return to Rome, and from there I'll go to see Loreto, then Parma, Modena, Ferrara, Mantua, Switzerland, Germany, the Netherlands, and Ostend, where I will take ship for home."

"And how long will you have devoted to the journey?"

"Six months."

"You will return to London able to give a full account of all the things worth seeing in your journey through this beautiful part of Europe."

"I hope I shall be able to convince Mama that she won't have thrown away what my journey is costing her."

"How much do you think that will be?"

"The hundred guineas she gave me, and no more."

"What! You will have supported yourself for six months and made this long journey, and you will have spent only a hundred guineas? It passes belief."

"If one will take the trouble to economize, one can spend even less."

"Perhaps. And to whom did you have letters of recommendation in all these countries you now know so well?"

"To no one. I have an English passport, and I let people suppose that I am an Englishman wherever I go."

"Aren't you afraid of bad company?"

"I neither let such people come near me, nor approach them myself. I confide in no one; when I am addressed I answer only in monosyllables, I eat and engage lodgings only after having come to an agreement, and I travel only in public conveyances, where the places are at a fixed tariff."

"Here, in the meanwhile, you will economize, for I will pay all your expenses, and I will give you an excellent guide, for you cannot do without one."

"You will excuse me if I accept nothing. I gave Mama my word of honor that I would accept nothing from anyone."

"You must see that that would not apply to me."

"No exceptions. I have relatives in Venice,[18] whom I saw, and my vow to my mother kept me from accepting a dinner. I have never broken a promise I have given."

I knew that he was a fanatic on the point, and I did not press him further. Joseph was twenty-three years of age, he was very short, very handsome, and he would have been taken for a girl if he had not let his whiskers grow so that they covered his cheeks. Despite all its patent absurdity, there was something about his journey which I could not help admiring. Since I was curious to know what his mother's situation was, and what had become of my daughter, he told me everything he knew straightforwardly. His mother was more in debt than ever, her creditors sent her to prison five or six times a year, she always got out by finding sureties or making new arrangements with her creditors, who had to let her come out so that she could pay them in part by the profits from the balls and assemblies which she gave, and which she could not have given if she had stayed in prison. My daughter, who must have been seventeen years old at the time, was pretty, full of talent, and enjoyed the protection and esteem of all the most highly placed ladies in London. She gave concerts and was still living with her mother, who mortified her every day, and over the merest trifles, which made poor Sophie shed tears. I asked him whom she had been supposed to marry when her mother took her out of the boarding school in which I had put her; and he replied that he had never heard of any marriage.

"Have you any employment?"

"None at all. Every year my mother wants to send me to the Indies in a ship loaded with merchandise belonging to me, by which she supposes I will lay the foundations of a great fortune; but it will never happen, for to get merchandise takes money, and my mother has nothing but debts."

Despite his promise I persuaded him to accept the services of my manservant as his guide. In a week he saw everything, and he insisted on leaving; all that I said to persuade him to stay for a week or ten days more was of no avail. He wrote me from Rome that he had left behind six shirts, which must be in one of the drawers of the chest in his room, and his greatcoat; he asked me to get them and bring them to him in Rome, but he failed to tell me where he was staying. He was a scatterbrain, yet he was confidently traveling through half of Europe, and, with the help of three or four well-tried maxims, he was coming to no harm.

I had an unexpected visit from Goudar, who, knowing that I had made my way into distinguished company, came to ask me to invite him and his wife to dinner with the Saxons and the English people, the diversions I was sharing with whom he knew did not include cards. He said that it was a pity not to introduce gaming among them, for they were born to lose. Being of the same opinion myself, I promised to do him the favor, on the understanding that there should be no play in my apartment, for I did not want to risk any unpleasantness. It was all that he asked of me, being sure that his wife would attract them to his lodgings, where he could play, he said, without fear of ill consequences. I undertook to give the dinner upon my return from Sorrento, for which we were to leave the next day.

The excursion to Sorrento was the last real pleasure I enjoyed in all my life. The advocate took us to a house where we were lodged as comfortably as we could wish. We had four rooms, one of which was occupied by Agata and her husband, another by Callimena and the advocate's former mistress, a very charming woman though no longer young, and the two others by Don Pasquale Latilla and myself. We went to call on the Duke of Serracapriola and the Abate Bettoni, though we declined their invitations to dinner and supper. After supper we went to bed early, and we rose in the morning to go walking, the advocate and his former mistress in one direction, Don Pasquale and Agata in another, while I took Callimena in yet another. At noon each day we were all back at the house for a dinner which was always delicious, and after it, leaving the advocate to take a siesta, Don Pasquale set out with Agata and her husband's former flame, and Callimena accompanied me along shaded walks where the least ray of the by then fiery sun could not penetrate. It was there that Callimena rewarded my passion, after struggling with herself for two days. On the third day, at five o'clock in the morning and in the presence of the rising Apollo, we sat down side by side on the grass and yielded to our desires. Callimena sacrificed herself neither to cupidity nor to gratitude, for I had given her only trifles, but to love, and I could have no doubt of it; she gave herself to me, and she was sorry that she had so long put off making me the gift. Before noon we changed our altar three times, and we spent the whole afternoon going everywhere on foot and stopping as soon as the least spark of passion inspired us with the desire to quench it.

On the fourth day, the wind being too strong, we returned to Naples in three carriages. Callimena persuaded me to confide to her aunt all that had happened between us, which would enable us to have the pleasure of spending some nights together in perfect freedom. Convinced that it would be my best course, and sure that her aunt would raise no objection in view of an arranagement of which I had already thought, I brought her niece back to her and then took her aside.

"Callimena," I said, "whom, as you know, I love dearly, has satisfied all my desires; but I do not feel entirely happy because I am not in a position to make her fortune. However, I can do something for her, under your guidance, by supplying her with such things as she needs and which she seems to be without, and by giving you enough to pay a master, who will perfect her in the art which she intends to practice, until she is accomplished enough in it to appear on the stage. So it is for you, my dear aunt, to tell me if you have any small debts, which I will pay to put your mind at ease, and what you will need to equip her with all the linen she needs as well as dresses to put her on an equal footing with all the other young ladies in the companies which she frequents.''

The aunt, who was a most worthy woman, was delighted by my frankness, and she told me that she would give me a written list of all the things Callimena needed the first time I should call on her; I told her that, having to go back to Rome in a few days, I would sup with Callimena every evening, and, finding her more than willing to grant me that favor, I went with her to her niece, who was delighted to hear of our arrangements. I began that same day to sup and sleep with her and indeed to win her heart completely, for I spent at least six hundred Neapolitan ducati to put her beyond want. I thought I had bought my happiness very cheaply. Agata, to whom I confided everything, was delighted to have been the agent of it.

Two or three days later I gave a dinner for the Englishmen, the Saxons, and the Saxons' tutor Bertoldi, with Madame Goudar, who came with Medini, which very much displeased me, for after the trick he had played on me I could not bear him; however, I immediately concealed my feelings, waiting for her husband, with whom I had it out. We had agreed that his wife should come to my house with no one but himself. The master scoundrel beat about the bush and tried to assure me that Medini had nothing to do with breaking my bank, but he wasted his eloquence.

Our dinner was choice and gay, and the beautiful Irish Sarah shone. She was a woman who had everything to please—youth, beauty, grace, intelligence, high spirits, talent, and, with all that, an air of distinction. After dinner the Russian Count Buturlin,[19] a great admirer of the fair sex, entered the drawing room where we were, which was next to the apartment in which he was staying. He came drawn by the sweet voice of the beautiful Madame Goudar, who was humming a Neapolitan song, accompanying herself on the guitar. The rich nobleman fell in love with her that day. It was he who, ten months after I left, obtained her favors in consideration of five hundred pounds sterling which Goudar needed to obey the order he received to leave Naples with his wife within three days.[20] This thunderbolt was launched by the Queen, who discovered that the King had had an interview with her in Procida,[21] and that the thing might go much further. She came upon her royal husband laughing heartily over a note and refusing to show it to her. The Queen's curiosity made her insist, and, the King yielding at last, the Queen read:

"Ti aspetterò domani nel medesimo luogo ed all'ora stessa con l'impazienza medesima che had una vacca, che desidera l'avvicinamento del toro" ("I will expect you tomorrow at the same place and the same time with all the impatience of a cow desiring the approach of the bull").

The Queen pretended to laugh, but on her own authority she signified to the cow's husband that he had only three days to go to live elsewhere. But for this order, Count Buturlin would not have been cured so cheaply.

Goudar invited the whole company to sup at his house in Posilipo the next day, and the supper was magnificent; but when Count Medini sat down at a large table and took up the cards to deal at faro before a heap of gold pieces which might come to five hundred once, no one chose to sit down to punt. Madame Goudar tried in vain to distribute livrets; the Englishmen and the Saxons told her that they would punt if she would hold the bank herself, or would have me deal for her, for they all feared Count Medini's too lucky hand. At that, Goudar took it upon himself to ask me if I would deal, taking a one-fourth share in the bank, but he found me inflexible. I told him that I would have dealt on equal shares with him, and putting up my half of the bank in cash. On hearing my answer, Goudar spoke to Medini, who, fearing to lose the opportunity of winning a great deal, did no more than rise and take back his money, leaving Goudar's on the table. Having only two hundred once in my purse, I took two hundred more from Goudar, and I sat down in the place which Medini had vacated. In less than two hours all my money was gone, and I went quietly home to console myself in the arms of my dear Callimena.

Thus left without money, I the next day determined to lighten the conscience of Agata's husband, who with his wife continued to urge me to take back the earrings and all the other pieces of jewelry which I had given her in Turin and Alessandria.[22] I told Agata that I would never have consented to such meanness if Fortune had not used me ill. When she told her husband the news he came out of his office with open arms to thank me as if I had made his fortune.

I told him that I would accept the value of the jewelry in cash, and he undertook to arrange it. The next morning he handed me the equivalent of fifteen thousand French livres, about fifteen hundred ducati. With this money I prepared to leave for Rome, intending to spend eight months there; but before I left, the advocate wanted to have me to dinner at a charming house he owned in Portici. What food for thought it gave me when I found myself in the very house in which, twenty-seven years earlier, I had made a small fortune by confounding the honest Greek with my false augmentation of mercury![23]

The King being then at Portici with the whole Court, we went there, and we witnessed an extraordinary spectacle which, though laughable, did not make us laugh.

The King, who was then only nineteen years of age, was amusing himself and the Queen in a large room by all sorts of pranks. He took it into his head to be blanketed, that is, to be thrown up into the air by means of a blanket held by four strong arms which simultaneously pull it taut. But after having made his courtiers laugh, the King wanted to have his turn at laughing. He began by proposing the same sport to the Queen, who protested only by shrieks of laughter, and the King did not press it upon the ladies who were present—for fear, I believe, that they would accept. The older courtiers, who were afraid, stole away, to my regret, for I should have been delighted to see a number of them flying into the air, among others the Prince of San Nicandro,[24] who had brought him up very badly, that is, too much in the Neapolitan way, giving him his own prejudices. So the King, who wanted more of the sublime sport, was reduced to proposing it to the young noblemen who were present and who perhaps hoped to receive such a proof of their playful monarch's favor. I did not fear I should be accorded the distinction, for I was unknown and not of a rank high enough to deserve it.

So after subjecting three or four young courtiers to a tossing, which they took with various degrees of courage and which set the Queen and all the ladies present laughing, and laughing in the Neapolitan manner, which is not the covert laughter of the Spanish Court, nor even has much in common with that of France and of other Courts, where sneezes are stifled and every gentleman is ruined if he dares let himself be seen yawning, his eyes fell on two young Florentine noblemen, brothers or cousins just arrived in Naples, who were there with their tutor, who had not been able to keep from laughing with his precious charges when they saw His Majesty and his favored victims bounding into the air.

The King very graciously approached the two unfortunate Tuscans, both of them hunchbacks, short of stature and ugly of countenance, who were flabbergasted by his proposal that they undress and display themselves to the entire company. Everyone listened in the deepest silence to the eloquence of the King, who, at the same time that he urged them to undress, gave them to understand that it was very unmannerly of them to refuse, for, he argued, they could not be humiliated by doing what he had himself done first. Their tutor, knowing that the King would be angered by a refusal, told them that they should accept the honor which His Majesty was offering them, whereupon the two little misshapen creatures took off their clothes, the silence ceased, and laughter broke out at the sight of their structure, which, offering the eyes of the spectators nothing but bodies with humps before and humps behind, set on long, thin shanks which made up three fourths of their height, drew uncontrollable laughter from everyone present, including their grave tutor, who was doing his best to encourage them and ashamed to see the elder of his hunchbacks crying. The King, assuring him that he ran no risk, took him by the hand, put him in the middle of the blanket, and, to do him as much honor as possible, himself took one corner of it.

How could anyone help shrieking with laughter at the sight of that misshapen body flying into the air three times to a height of ten or twelve feet? After getting through it, he put on his clothes, and the other hunchback submitted to the same ordeal with somewhat better grace. Their tutor, to whom the King was bent on conferring the same honor, had taken to his heels, at which the monarch laughed heartily.

We enjoyed for nothing a spectacle which was worth gold. Don Pasquale Latilla, whom the King had fortunately not seen, told us at table countless anecdotes of the good King, all of which testified to an excellent character and an irresistible bent for gaiety at the expense of the cumbersome gravity and dignity in which royalty is made to consist. He told us that all who came near him could not but love him, because he preferred the pleasure of being treated as a friend to the feeling of pride with which the human heart may be filled when it sees itself surrounded by faces on which nothing is depicted but respect and fear. He was never so unhappy as when his minister Tanucci forced him to be severe in cases where severity was his duty, and he was never so joyful as when he found himself able to do a favor, so that he could be regarded as the fortunate sovereign whom the poet so well depicts in the distich:

> Quique dolet quoties cogitur esse ferox
> ("A prince who is slow to punish, quick to reward, and who grieves each time that he has to be severe").[25]

His education had been such that he had read nothing and learned nothing, he had no interest in any kind of literature, but he had an excellent mind and the highest esteem for men who had gained a distinguished reputation either by their probity or by their knowledge. He revered the minister Di Marco, he had the greatest respect for the memory of Don Lelio Caraffa,[26] of the ducal house of Matalona, and he had provided generously for a young nephew of the scholar Genovesi[27] out of consideration for his illustrious uncle.

Gambling being forbidden, he had one day come upon the officers of his guard playing faro. Terrified at the sight of the King, they tried to hide the cards and the money; but he told them not to let him disturb them, but to be very careful that Tanucci did not learn of their foolhardiness, at the same time assuring them that he would tell him nothing. When he was scarcely forty years of age, the King seized the opportunity to make himself loved and esteemed by all Italy and a good part of Germany, everywhere giving proofs of his good character and his virtues. His father loved him dearly until the time came when good reasons of state obliged him to resist the orders he wanted to give him in accordance with the views of his ministers. Ferdinand knew that, though he was the King of Spain's son, he must none the less be King of the Two Sicilies.[28] He had deferred long enough to Tanucci's authority in the Government. A few months after the suppression of the Jesuits he wrote his father a letter[29] the beginning of which is very amusing.

"Of all the things which I do not understand," he wrote, "four astonish me. The first is that not a soldo was found among the suppressed Jesuits, who were said to be so rich. The second is that all the scrivani[30] in my Kingdom are rich, though the law forbids their receiving any pay. The third is that all young wives who have young husbands become pregnant one day or another, and that mine[31] never does; and the fourth is that everyone dies when his time comes except Tanucci, who will live, I believe, until the end of the world."[32]

The King of Spain showed this letter to all his ministers at the Escorial to convince them that his son, the King of Naples, was clever, and he was right. A man who writes like that without instruction is clever.

A day or two later the Cavaliere Morosini, the nineteen-year-old nephew of the Procurator and sole heir of that illustrious House, came to Naples with Count Stratico,[33] his tutor, Professor of Mathematics at the University of Padua, who had given me a letter to his brother the monk, Professor at the University of Pisa. He came to lodge at the "Crocelle," and our pleasure in seeing each other again was mutual. The young Venetian was traveling to complete his education by learning to know Italy; he had spent three years at the Academy[34] in Turin; and he had with him a man with whom he could have become everything he could wish in order one day to be capable of filling the most important posts in his country and distinguishing himself from the common run of those who make up the Venetian nobility, which rules the Republic; but unfortunately the rich, handsome, and not unintelligent youth had no will to learn. He had an animal love of women, he enjoyed rioting with libertines, and good society made him yawn. Detesting study, he devoted himself entirely to inventing ways to amuse himself and to spend money broadcast, more to avenge himself for the economy his uncle wanted him to practice than from natural generosity. He complained that though he had reached his majority his uncle still tried to keep him under tutelage. He had calculated that he could spend eight hundred zecchini a month, and he thought it very unjust that he was confined to spending only two hundred; in this conviction he tried his best to get into debt, and he sent Count Stratico packing when he mildly reproached him for his extravagance and pointed out that, by practicing economy, he could be lavish when he returned to Venice, where his uncle had arranged an incomparable marriage for him with a very pretty girl who was the heiress to the House of Grimani de'Servi.[35] The only thing about him which did not dismay his tutor was that he could not bear cards, either played socially or for money; for this reason I did not hesitate to introduce him to Madame Goudar as soon as, having learned that I knew her, he asked me to do him the favor.

After my bank had been broken I had been at Goudar's house, but I had always refused to play. Medini had become my mortal enemy; he left when he saw me arrive, but I pretended not to notice it. He was there on the day when I introduced Morosini and his tutor, and, forming designs on him, he at once became very intimate with him; but when he found him firmly resolved not to play, his hatred of me redoubled, for he felt certain that if the young man did not play it could only be because I had warned him. Morosini, enchanted by the charms of the beautiful Madame Goudar, thought of nothing but winning her favors by the force of love. He would have hated her if he could have supposed that the only way to conquer her was to offer her money. He told me more than once that, if he was reduced to paying a woman he loved to obtain her, he would feel so debased that he would certainly be cured of the love she had inspired in him; for he maintained, and he was right, that his virtues as a man were at least equal to any that La Goudar might have as a woman. Another of Morosini's quirks was that he refused to be the dupe of a woman with whom he had fallen in love and who wanted to receive presents from him before she had granted him her favors, and La Goudar's particular game was exactly contrary to any such principle. She wanted her lover to give her credit. His tutor Stratico was delighted to see him cultivating this acquaintance, for the great thing was to occupy the young man, who otherwise would find no way to amuse himself except riding horseback, not like a gentleman but galloping ten or twelve stages a day, foundering horses for which he paid afterward. His worthy tutor every day expected to hear that he had had an accident.

It was when I had already resolved to leave that Don Pasquale Latilla came to see me with the Abbé Galiani,[36] whom I had known in Paris. My reader may remember that I had made the acquaintance of his brother in Sant' Agata, that I had lodged in his house, where I had left Donna Lucrezia Castelli.[37] I at once told him that I intended to pay him a visit, and I asked him if Donna Lucrezia was still staying with him. He replied that Donna Lucrezia was living in Salerno with the Marchesa della C. . . ,[38] her daughter. But for this visit I could not have had news of my former mistress except at the Marchese Galiani's, and I should not have had one of the greatest pleasures my soul has enjoyed in all my life. I ask him if he knows the Marchesa della C. . . , and he replies that he knows only her husband, who is old and very rich. I ask him no more.

A day or two afterward the Cavaliere Morosini gave a dinner for Madame Goudar, her husband, two other young men whom he had met gaming at her house, and Medini, who still hoped to make the Cavaliere his dupe in one way or another.

Toward the end of dinner it happened that Medini differed from me on a certain subject. Since he had expressed his opinion with considerable acerbity, I put it to him that a polite man ought to speak in a different tone; he replied that it might be so, but that he had no intention of taking lessons in good manners from me. I restrained myself, but I was tired of putting up with such shafts from a man who might have reason to hate me, but who, having been originally in the wrong, ought to conceal his hatred. I thought that he might attribute my prudence to fear and, on that supposition, would become constantly more insolent. I resolved to teach him better once again. My reader may remember over what we had fought a duel.[39] He was drinking coffee on the balcony, enjoying the cool breeze from the sea, when, with my cup of coffee in my hand, I approached him and, there being no one within earshot, told him that I was tired of putting up with his bad temper when chance brought us together in company. He replied that I would find him still more cutting if we could be alone together without witnesses. I replied with a laugh that if we were alone together, I could easily teach him a lesson. He riposted by saying that he should like to see how easily, and that our being alone together could be arranged at once. I invited him to follow me as soon as he saw me leave, as if nothing were afoot, and he said that he would not fail to do so.

At that I left him and returned to the company, and a quarter of an hour later I left the inn, walking slowly toward Posilipo. I saw him following me at a distance, and then I had no doubt that we should fight, for he was brave. We were both wearing our swords. I turned right at the end of the beach, and when I saw that I was in the country, where we could even hide our encounter behind trees, I stopped, and when he came up I thought I might speak to him, and even that he would not be sorry to have it out in words; but, doubling his pace, the brute came at me like a madman, with his sword in his right hand and his hat in his left. I quickly unsheathed, and, without a thought of giving ground, I stopped him by lunging just when, instead of parrying, he lunged too, with the result that we ran our swords halfway up each other's coat sleeves. We at once withdrew them, but his only pierced my sleeve in two places, while mine wounded him in the forearm and in the flesh above the elbow. When I made to continue, he fell back, and, having seen that his parry had no vigor, I said that I would give him quarter if the wound I had given him prevented him from defending himself. So saying, and seeing that he did not answer me, I played with his sword, then, with a smart blow near the hilt, I knocked it to the ground and at once set my foot on it. Foaming with rage, he said I had got the better of him that time, because the slight wound I had given him had deprived him of the strength to hold his sword, but that he hoped I would give him his revenge. I promised to do so at Rome, and, seeing that he was losing much blood, I put his sword in the sheath myself, and I left, advising him to go to Goudar's house, which was two hundred paces away, to have his wound dressed at once.

I returned perfectly calmly to the "Crocelle," as if nothing had happened. The Cavaliere Morosini was flirting with the beautiful Sarah, and Goudar was playing quadrille[40] with Stratico and the two others. An hour later I left, without having said a word to them about Medini. I went for the last time to sup and sleep with my dear Callimena, whom I did not see again until six years later in Venice, performing brilliantly on the stage of the Teatro San Benedetto.[41] I went to the "Crocelle" at daybreak, and at eight o'clock I set out, taking leave of no one, in a post chaise into which I put all my luggage. At two o'clock in the afternoon I arrived in Salerno, where, after putting my trunks in an excellent room, I wrote a note to Donna Lucrezia Castelli in care of the Marchesa della C. . . . I asked her if I might pay her a visit, after which I would leave Salerno. I asked her to answer me at once, while I was dining.

A half hour later, when I was in the middle of dinner, I see Donna Lucrezia herself enter my room with her face the picture of joy and run to my arms, declaring herself happy to see me once more in her country. The enchanting woman was exactly my age, but she looked at least ten years younger than I. After telling her that it was from the Abbé Galiani that I had learned where she was, I ask her for news of our daughter, and she replies that she was awaiting me with her husband the Marchese, a worthy old man who was eager to meet me.

"How does he know that I exist?"

"Leonilda has talked to him about you countless times in the five years since she became his wife. He even knows that you gave her five thousand ducati; and you shall sup with us tonight"

"Let us go there at once, my dear friend, I am dying to see her again, and the kind husband God has given her. Has she children?"

"No, and it is unfortunate for her, because all of her husband's estate will go to his nearest relatives when he dies; but Leonilda will still be rich, for she will have a hundred thousand ducati."

"And you have never wanted to marry?"

"Never"

"You are beautiful, as you were twenty-six years ago, my charming old flame; but for the Abbé Galiani, I should have left Naples without seeing you."

I quickly pick up my hat, I lock all my belongings into my room, and I go with her to the house of the Marchese della C. . . . I find Donna Leonilda at least three inches taller, and, at the age of twenty-five, become a perfect beauty. Her husband's presence does not trouble her, she comes to me with open arms, and she saves me from the embarrassment into which I should have been thrown by a prejudice which would have made it impossible for me to act freely. She was my daughter, and nature, far from preventing me from having all the feelings of a lover toward her, forbade me to have only the inconsequential ones of father. After two fond embraces, which lasted only a moment, she introduces me to her husband, who, suffering from gout, could not stir from the chair to which it condemned him. Seeing him with a smile on his handsome face, his nightcap in his hand, and his arms open, I kissed the worthy man on both cheeks, and I was surprised by a third kiss, which he offers to my lips and which I return with a sign which sufficed to tell us that we were brothers.[42] The Marchese expected it, but I did not. A nobleman seventy years of age who could boast that he had seen the light was a rare phenomenon thirty years ago in the Kingdom of Sicily. I sit down beside him, whereupon, our certainty of our divine alliance being renewed, our embraces begin again, and the two women who were their astonished witnesses cannot understand how the recognition could have come about. Donna Leonilda is delighted to find that her husband had long known me, she tells him so, embracing him, and the worthy old man laughed loud and long. Only Donna Lucrezia suspects the truth; her daughter can make nothing of the scene, and saves her questions for another time.

The Marchese della C. . . was a nobleman who had traveled in every part of Europe, who had lived life to the full, and who did not think of marrying until his father died at the age of ninety. Finding himself provided with an income of thirty thousand ducati, which comes to a hundred and twenty thousand French livres, and hence wealthy in a country where everything is cheap, he thought he could still have children despite his advanced age. He saw Donna Leonilda at the theater in Naples, and in a few days he signed the contract, granting her a dowry of a hundred thousand ducati. The Duke of Matalona having died, and Donna Lucrezia living with her daughter at the time, she went to live with her in Salerno. Her husband, though he lived sumptuously, could never spend half of his income. All his relatives had lodgings in his immense palace; there were three families of them, each living apart from the others. All these relatives were well off, and they were all waiting for the Marchese to die so that they could share his wealth among them, which distressed him, for he did not like them. He had married only to have an heir, and he no longer hoped for one; but that did not lessen his love for his wife, who made him happy by the charm of her intelligence. Like her, he was a freethinker, but in the greatest secrecy, no one thought freely in Salerno, so he lived with his wife and his mother-in-law like a good Christian, adopting all the prejudices of his fellow countrymen. All this I learned from Donna Leonilda three hours later while walking in his beautiful garden, to which he sent us after talking with me for three hours on all sorts of interesting subjects, which could be of no interest either to his wife or to his mother-in-law, though both of them remained with us, delighted to see the worthy man in ecstasies over having someone to talk with who thought as he did.

About six o'clock he asked Donna Lucrezia to take me to the garden and entertain me there until nightfall, and at the same time he asked his wife to remain with him because he had something to say to her. We were in the middle of August, and the heat was intense; but a gentle breeze tempered it in the apartment on the ground floor in which we were. Since I saw through the open window that the air was perfectly still, for the leaves of the trees were not moving, I could not help telling the Marchese that I was astonished to find perfect spring weather in the room in which we were. He told Donna Lucrezia to take me to the place which would show me what caused the coolness we had enjoyed.

Fifty paces from the room in which we were, after passing through a suite of five or six, we came to a closet in one corner of which was an opening four feet square. It was this dark window which gave passage to a very cool wind, which indeed was much too strong, so that it would have been unhealthy for anyone who stood at the window too long. The aperture was at the top of a flight of more than a hundred stone steps, which led to a grotto in which there was a perpetual spring of ice-cold water. Donna Lucrezia told me that I should run a great risk if I went down to the grotto without first dressing as if in the dead of winter. I have never been foolhardy enough to risk that kind of danger. Lord Baltimore would have made light of it. I told my dear friend that I could well imagine how the thing could be, and indeed understood how it must be; so we went to the garden, which was separated from another larger one used by the three other families; but in this one there was every delight for which one could wish—flowers scenting the air, fountains, grottoes decorated with shellwork and furnished with couches stuffed with down, than which nothing could be softer. A large round pond, more than ten fathoms[43] deep, contained fish of twenty different kinds and of every color, which swam sinuously about and which, being intended only to please the sight, and so not fearing the rapacity of the epicures who would have liked to catch and eat them, came fearlessly sporting even into the hands held close to the surface of their element. The covered walks of this pretty paradise were overhung with vines and great bunches of grapes as broad as the leaves which separated them, and fruit trees to left and right formed the colonnade which supported them.

I told my dear Lucrezia, who was enjoying my delight, that I was not surprised that the garden aroused more pleasing sensations in me than the vineyards of Tivoli and Frascati, for everything extensive is more apt to dazzle than to charm. In half an hour she informed me of all her daughter's happiness and all the good qualities of the Marchese, who, except for the gout, enjoyed perfect health. His only misfortune, his sorrow which he nevertheless had the strength of mind to hide, was that he had no children; it was a hard trial for his philosophy, for, among ten or twelve nephews, he had not found one who promised to be distinguished either in body or mind.

"They are all ugly," she said, "and all dullards, brought up like peasants by boors and ignorant priests."

"But is our daughter really happy?"

"Very happy, even though she cannot find in the husband she adores the lover whom she needs at her age."

"The Marchese seems to me a man incapable of jealousy."

"He is not jealous, and I am sure that if, among the nobility of this city, she could have found a man capable of pleasing her the Marchese would have made a friend of him and would even not have been sorry to see her become pregnant"

"Is he in a position to be absolutely certain that, if she gives him a child, he cannot be its father?"

"Not entirely certain, for when his health is good he comes to sleep with her, and, according to what my daughter has told me, he could flatter himself that he had really done what he had not done. But there is no longer any likelihood that his ardor will have happy results. My daughter had reason to hope so during the first six months of their marriage, but after that his attacks of gout became so much worse that his nerves were weakened to the point that she herself concluded that the transports of conjugal love might be fatal to him. Hence she is never so distressed as when he wants to sleep with her."

In ecstasies of admiration for the unchanging qualities of my dear former mistress, I was beginning to tell her what power her charms still had over my amorous soul, when the Marchesa appeared in the covered walk down which we were strolling, followed by a page who held up the train of her dress and a young lady on her left who kept half a pace behind her. As she approached I went through all the motions of showing the most profound respect, to which she responded by affecting the most refined politeness. She said that she had come to negotiate a matter of the utmost consequence, for if she failed she would lose all the confidence her husband had in her.

"Where, beautiful Marchesa, is there a negotiator with whom you can fear not to succeed?"

"It is yourself."

"If it is I," I replied with a laugh, "your reputation runs no risk, for I give you carte blanche even before I know what it is all about. I make only one exception."

"So much the worse, for unfortunately the exception might be the very thing. Tell me what it is, I beg you, before I speak."

"I was about to leave for Rome on urgent business, when the Abbé Galiani told me that Donna Lucrezia is living with you. I made the necessary arrangements so that sixty extra miles will not interfere with my business."

"And could a short delay put your life or your honor in danger? Are you no longer your own master? To whom are you responsible? This is the ruin of my negotiation."

"Wait, I beg you, and let me see that beautiful countenance serene again. Your orders, and even your wishes, can never endanger either my life or my honor. Yes, I am still completely my own master, and I will never cease to be so except at this moment. I am yours to command."

"Very good. You shall come to spend a few days with us at an estate which is only an hour and a half from here.

My husband will have himself carried there. You will allow me to send to your inn for all your luggage and have it brought here."

"Here, Signora, is the key to my room. Happy the man to whom you grant the opportunity to obey you!"

At that she gave the key to her page, ordering him to go there himself with some menservants to take everything and see to it that nothing was left behind. The page was a very handsome boy; and her chambermaid, or maid-in-waiting, who was following us, was a charming blonde. I told her so, thinking that she did not understand French; she smiled and told her mistress that I knew her but had forgotten her.

"You saw me and talked with me several times, and even made me angry with you, when I was with the Duchess of Matalona, now Princess of Caramanica."

"It is possible; you must have been very different nine years ago from what you are today. I am sorry, Signorina, that I do not remember having done anything to make you angry."

The Marchesa and her mother laughed heartily at the exchange, and urged her to tell what I had done to make her angry, but she blushed and said no more than that I had played jokes on her. I remembered that I had given her a few kisses, almost by force; but the Marchesa and her mother believed what they pleased. Since I had some knowledge of the human heart, it seemed to me that Signorina Anastasia (such was her name) had quite given herself away by reproaching me, and that if she wanted me she should have said nothing.

"You were," I said to her, "much shorter and very thin."

"I was only twelve years old. You have changed too, for it seems to me your eyes were blacker and your complexion lighter."

"That is to say, less dark. I am old, Signorina."

But full of ardor for both the mother and the daughter, I turned the conversation to the late Duke, and Anastasia left us. We went and sat down in a grotto, where, as soon as were alone, we surrendered to the pleasure of addressing each other by the fond names of daughter and father, which gave us the right to intimacies which, though imperfect, were sinful nevertheless. The Marchesa thought it her duty to calm my transports by saying that when we had given rein to our senses despite the ties of blood she was her own mistress, whereas now she had a master. Donna Lucrezia, who saw me in ecstasies with her daughter in my arms, and who saw that her daughter was moved too and offered very little resistance to my caresses, warned us to restrain ourselves and take good care not to be led into consummating our mutual crime, and, so saying, she went to another part of the walk. But her words, followed by her departure, had the very opposite effect to the advice she had given us. Determined to consummate the so-called crime, we came so close to it that an almost involuntary movement forced us to consummate it so completely that we could not have done more if we had been acting according to a premeditated plan conceived by the free exercise of reason. We remained motionless, looking at each other without changing our position, both of us serious and silent, lost in reflection, astonished, as we told each other afterward, to feel neither guilty nor tormented by remorse. We arranged our clothing, and my daughter, sitting beside me, called me "husband" even as I called her "wife." By sweet kisses we confirmed what we had just done, and even if an angel had come to tell us we had monstrously outraged nature we should have laughed at him. Absorbed as we were in this perfectly decorous tenderness, Donna Lucrezia was edified to find us become so calm.

We did not need to discuss it together to know that we must keep our secret. Donna Lucrezia was intelligent, but everything compelled us not to tell her what it was neither necessary nor advantageous to confide to her. It seemed to us that, by leaving us alone, she had wanted only to be sure that she would not witness what we were going to do. But in fact, as she told us immediately, she believed that we had let ourselves indulge in nothing but inconsequential toying, and she laughed when we could not deny it. We recalled the beautiful night we had all three spent in one bed, and Donna Lucrezia was very well pleased by my candor when I told her that my hand had found her daughter almost exactly as she was when she had slept with us nine years before. We left the walk, and we returned to the palace with Anastasia.

The Marchese received his wife very gaily, congratulating her on the success of her negotiation, and telling me that at his country house I should be lodged better than in the apartment to which my luggage had been taken. He told his mother-in-law that he hoped she would not be sorry to have me in the room next to hers. She replied that our good days were over. I was surprised that, knowing that I had wanted to marry Donna Leonilda, he should think that I was sufficiently cured of my passion to prefer her mother to her. Five places were laid on a large table, and scarcely were we served before I saw an old priest come in and sit down without looking at anyone. Nor did anyone ever speak to him. The same handsome page, as he was called, stood behind the Marchesa, and ten or twelve others busied themselves serving everyone. Having dined on nothing but soup, I ate like an ogre. The Marchese had a French cook, who employed his art to give him excellent fare; so, except for the dish of macaroni, the supper was composed entirely of entrées; the Marchese exclaimed with delight when he saw how I ate; he said it was his great misfortune that both his wife and her mother were not hearty eaters. At dessert, our spirits raised by the excellent wines, the conversation became animated, and, since we were speaking French and the priest did not understand a word of what we were saying, he left, after reciting the Agimus.[44] The Marchese told me that he had held the post of confessor in his house for fifteen years, but that no one had ever confessed to him; he warned me against saying anything heretical in the ignoramus's presence, but added that I could say anything I pleased in French. Being in the vein, I kept them amused at table until an hour after midnight. Before we parted he told us that we should leave after dining, and that he would arrive an hour after we did. He assured his wife that he felt well, and that he intended to convince her that I had taken ten years from his age. She then kissed him very fondly, begging him to take care of his health; but it had no effect, he promised her a visit.

I then left with Donna Lucrezia, wishing them a fine boy, to be delivered in nine months.

"Draw up the bill," he said, "and tomorrow morning I will accept it."

"I will do everything in my power," said Donna Leonilda, "to keep you from going bankrupt."

Donna Lucrezia showed me to my room, where, after turning me over to a tall lackey, she wished me good night. After sleeping for eight hours in an excellent bed, I got up and I went to find Donna Lucrezia, who took me to breakfast in the apartment of the Marchesa, who was already dressing. I at once asked her if I could venture to draw my bill at nine months, and she replied that it would very likely be paid.

"Really?"

"Really; and it will be to you that the Marchese will be indebted for the only happiness which he lacks, and for which he longs with all his soul. He told me so himself when he left me an hour ago."

What a disappointment not to be able to give her a hundred kisses! She was as fresh as a rose, but we had to restrain ourselves. She was surrounded by pretty girls, all of them in her service. I flirted with Anastasia, and Leonilda pretended to encourage me. Understanding what she had in mind, I made a show of passion, and I saw that I should not be dismissed unheard. But I set myself certain bounds, so that I should not be taken at my word.

We went to breakfast in the apartment of the Marchese, who was expecting us and who received me joyfully. The worthy man's health would have been excellent if the gout had not deprived him of the use of his legs for walking. He could not even stand up, or bear the slightest touch on his feet: any contact caused him intolerably acute pain. After breakfast we heard mass, at which I saw more than twenty menservants and maids, and after the mass I kept him company until dinnertime. He was very grateful to me for preferring his company to that of his wife and his mother-in-law, with whom he believed I was still in love.

After dinner we left for his country estate, I in a carriage with the mother and daughter, he in a covered litter carried on two shafts by two mules, one in front of the other. In an hour and a half we came to his estate, which was between Picenza and Battipaglia.[45] His ancestral castle was large and beautiful and very well situated. While we waited for the Marchesa's chambermaids to arrive, she took me to her gardens, where, my love having revived, she abandoned herself to it once again. We agreed that I was not to enter her apartment except to flirt with Anastasia, for we must not give anyone the least occasion for suspecting our love. Indeed, my flirtation with Anastasia was to amuse the Marchese, whom she would not fail to keep informed of it. Donna Lucrezia approved of our measures, for she did not want the Marchese to think that I had stopped in Salerno on her account. My apartment adjoined hers, but I could not enter hers except through the room in which Anastasia slept with another of her chambermaids, who was even prettier.

The Marchese arrived an hour after us, with all the menservants and with mine, who brought me my luggage. Carried in a comfortable armchair, he himself took me to see all the beautiful walks of his gardens, while waiting for his wife and his mother-in-law to arrange everything in the castle. After supper, being very tired, he withdrew, leaving me with the ladies. I escorted the Marchesa to her room, and when I started to leave she told me that I could go to my room by way of her maids' room, and she ordered Anastasia to escort me to it. Politeness demanding that I show myself not insensible to this piece of good fortune, I told the beauty who was lighting my way that her mistrusting my proximity to the point of locking herself in would be a reflection on my character which I hoped she would spare me. She replied that she felt no mistrust, but that she would lock her door nevertheless, for it was her duty, and the more so because the room was her mistress's anteroom and because the maid who shared it with her would think the worst of her if she dared to leave her room unlocked. Admitting that she was right, I asked her to sit down beside me for a moment and remind me of what I could have done to anger her nine years earlier. She replied that she did not want to remember it, and she asked me to allow her to leave, which I did after she permitted me a kiss which I made her think I wanted. After she left, my manservant having come in, I told him that I did not need his services after supper. He understood what I meant, and on the following nights he did not come. The next day the Marchesa laughingly repeated to me the whole of the conversation I had had with Anastasia. She had confided it all to her, withholding not the slightest detail, and she had praised her for refusing to leave her door unlocked, but she had told her that she could offer me all her services in my room. The Marchesa purposely regaled her husband with the story, and he, believing that I was in love with Anastasia, twitted me with it good-humoredly after dinner, and that evening he had her sup with us, which obliged me to play the part of respectful suitor to the girl, who was much flattered by my giving her the preference over her charming mistress and by the latter's kindness in showing no disapprobation either of my passion or of the concessions by which she might keep it alive. The Marchese enjoyed the pretty comedy which the intrigue suggested to his imagination, for by making it possible for me to play it he considered that he was doing me the honors of his house and making me want to stay there a few days longer.

Anastasia came with a candle to show me to my room, where, when she learned that I had no servant, she insisted on dressing my hair for the night; gratified that I did not venture to go to bed in her presence, she sat with me for a good half hour, during which, since I was not in love with her, I had no difficulty in playing the timid suitor. When she wished me good night she was delighted that my kisses were less bold than those I had given her the evening before. The Marchesa said to me the next morning that, if what Anastasia had told her was true, she concluded that I must find her a trial, for she was sure that if I loved her I should not be timid.

“She is no trial at all, for the scene we play is pretty and amusing; but I am amazed that you think I can love her, when we agreed that it was to be only a feint to amuse the Marchese and put the servants' suspicions to sleep.”

“Anastasia believes that you adore her, and I am not sorry that you are giving her a decided liking for coquetry.”

“If in the meantime I can bring her to leave her door unlocked I could easily go to your room without her having the least suspicion, for when I leave her bed, where I would have done nothing of consequence, she could never imagine that instead of going to my room I go to yours.”

“Take care how you go about it.”

Both the Marchese and Donna Lucrezia credited me with behaving as became a man of discretion, but at the same time they were certain that the girl Anastasia slept with me every night, which delighted them. Meanwhile I spent all day with the Marchese, who insisted that I made him happy. It cost me nothing, for I liked his principles and his intelligence. During the third supper with Anastasia I showed myself more ardent than usual, and she was astonished when she found me cold in my room; she said that she was glad to see me become calm. I replied that the reason for it was that I imagined she thought she was in danger when she was alone with me.

"Not a bit of it. I believe you have learned wisdom; you are very different in that respect from what you were nine years ago."

"But what extravagances did I commit then?"

"It was not that; you simply failed to consider that I was still a child."

"I gave you a few harmless caresses, for which I am sorry because now they make you think you must be on your guard and keep your door locked."

"It is not because I am mistrustful, but for the reasons I told you, which you acknowledged were sound. I could also say that it is a kind of mistrust which keeps you from going to bed while I am here."

"Good God! You must think me a great fool. I will go to bed at once. But you shall not leave until you have come and kissed me."

"Gladly."

So I got into bed; and Anastasia came and spent half an hour with me, during which I had the greatest difficulty in denying myself everything; but I had to act so, for I was afraid that she would tell it all to the Marchesa. When she left, Anastasia gave me such a sweet embrace that I could no longer control myself. Her own hand, guided by mine, convinced her that I loved her, and she went away—whether edified or annoyed by my restraint I do not know.

Very curious the next morning to hear how she had described the scene to the Marchesa, I was not sorry to learn that she had said nothing of her touching me. This made me certain that she would leave her door unlocked for me, and I promised my dear Leonilda that I would come and spend two hours with her. When Anastasia visited me after supper I challenged her to show as much confidence in me as I had shown in her, and she said that she would willingly do so provided that I would blow out my candle and never once put my hand on her. I promised, and I was certain I would keep my word, for I must not risk cutting a poor figure with my dear Marchesa. I put out my candle as soon as she left, and I saw her undress, kneel down in her shift to say her prayers, then get into bed and blow out the candle.

At that I undressed quickly, went into her room barefoot, and sat down beside her, when she at once took hold of both my hands. I made no effort to free them, which she attributed to my great love and the promise I had made her. The only part of us which allowed itself freedom of action was our lips, which in half an hour gave and received a quantity of kisses, but silently for fear that her roommate would hear them. For the same reason we never said a word to each other. The half hour passed very slowly for me and with a discomfort which it is hard to imagine. I had to believe that Anastasia enjoyed it, for she found that she had the power to make me do whatever she pleased. When I left her I went to my room; but as soon as I thought she was asleep, I crossed hers and entered Leonilda's; she was expecting me, but she did not know that I had come in until she felt me embrace her. After giving her the liveliest tokens of my love, I told her, hiding nothing, all that I had done to persuade Anastasia to leave her door unlocked for me, and all that I had done during the half hour I had been beside her on her bed. After spending two delicious hours with my dear Leonilda, I left her, certain that they would not be the last. I returned to my room without making the slightest noise to betray the secret. I slept until noon. The Marchese and Donna Lucrezia twitted me with it at dinner, and at supper they twitted Anastasia, who played her role very well. When we were alone together she told me that she would no longer lock her door, but that it was useless and even dangerous for me to come to her in her room, so it would be better if we talked by candlelight in mine, but that to assure her that she was not inconveniencing me I must go to bed. I had to consent. I hoped that nothing would happen which could prevent me from going to spend another two hours with the Marchesa after Anastasia had spent a constrained hour with me; but I miscalculated, and it was my own fault.

In bed, with Anastasia in my arms and her lips pressed to mine, I told her that she did not trust me enough to undress and get into my bed with me; thus challenged, she replied by asking me if I would promise to be on my good behavior. Only a fool would have answered no. I made up my mind, and, answering yes, I prepared to make her happy, for the poor, pretty girl had fought against herself quite long enough the evening before. She took off her dress, she let her petticoat drop, and she came to my arms, in a surrender which left her with no thought of demanding that I keep my promise. Appetite, says the proverb, grows with eating. Her ardor made me amorous, she threw off all restraint, she displayed all her beauties to me, and I did not cease to do her justice until sleep overcame my senses. She then had to leave me. When I woke, feeling strangely put out, for what had happened so unseasonably was bound to interfere with my visits to the Marchesa, I laughed when I saw that I should have to tell her everything. I saw that I had become Anastasia's victim despite myself, for, aside from its being unforgivable if I had sent her away after half an hour's amusement, she would have locked her door; and even if she had not locked it, what would I have done with Leonilda after Anastasia had exhausted me?

When I told Leonilda the whole story she could not but laugh, and she saw as well as I did that I could have nothing more for her. We had to resign ourselves. During the five or six more days that I stayed on there, I had Leonilda only two or three more times in an arbor in the garden and in the greatest haste. I had to receive Anastasia in my bed every night, and to end by her thinking me a traitor when I raised objections to her offer to come to Rome with me, where she told me she had a very rich uncle who would take care of her when I no longer loved her. She declared that if I loved her I could not refuse her offer; and she was right, but I did not love her enough to make her my mistress, when my whole fortune amounted to only a thousand zecchini.

The evening before I left, the Marchese della C. . . strangely surprised me by a proposal he made to me in private. Without any long preamble, the generous man, after thanking me for having kept him such good company, told me that he had learned from the Duke of Matalona himself the reason why I had not married his wife, and that he had always admired me for making her a present of five thousand ducati when I left Naples, though I was not rich.

"Those five thousand ducati," he went on, "with five or six thousand more which she had from the Duke's generosity, made up her dowry, to which I added a hundred thousand, so that she is sure of a fortune even if I die without having a child. What I now ask is that you be kind enough to accept the return of the five thousand ducati you gave Leonilda; it is she who wants to give you this token of her affection and esteem; I approved of her noble generosity, but I did not want her to deprive herself: it is from me that you shall receive them today. She did not dare to express to you what I have just told you, because of a delicacy for which you must be grateful to her. She thought you would be offended by her trying to discharge her obligation to you by this restitution."

"And she would have been right, I should have refused to accept the five thousand ducati from her, but I do not refuse them from you, for I consider them only a gift inspired by the noblest of all your virtues. A refusal on my part, my dear Marchese, could spring from nothing but a stupid and most inappropriate pride, for I am not rich. What I wish is that your wife and her mother shall be present when you make me this gift."

"We will do it after dinner."

The city of Naples was my Temple of Fortune each of the four times that I stayed there. If I went there now, I should die of starvation. Fortune scorns old age. The last time I went there, she sent me two rich and happy women, who gave me back what I had given them, as if it had been lent. Leonilda and her mother wept for joy when the Marchese handed me the five thousand ducati in bank notes in their presence and at the same time gave another five thousand to Donna Lucrezia by way of rewarding her for having been the person who introduced me to him. He was discreet enough not to reveal the more important reason to her. Donna Lucrezia did not know that the Duke of Matalona had told him that Leonilda was my daughter. Gratitude tempered my high spirits all the rest of the day, and Anastasia spent a rather gloomy night with me. When she reproached me with not loving her, I replied only ambiguously. I left the next morning at eight o'clock, after the most refined sentiments on all our parts found expression only in words which interpreted them most inadequately. I very gladly promised the Marchese that I would write to him from Rome. I arrived at Agata's house in Naples at eleven o'clock, finding her amazed to see me, for she thought I was in Rome. Her husband received me with expressions of the greatest friendship, despite li flati[46] from which he was suffering severely that day. I told him that I was determined to leave after dinner, and that I had only come to embrace him and ask him to get me a bill of exchange on Rome against the five thousand Neapolitan ducati which I gave him. He promised me that it would be ready before three o'clock, and Agata, who was delighted, at once sent word to Callimena to come to dine with her.

Very much surprised to see me still in Naples when she thought I had been in Rome for two weeks, the good-hearted girl told me all the details of her amour with the young Cavaliere Morosini, which lasted only ten days; but she had nothing to complain of but his inconstancy. He had left her for a dancing girl. My two weeks' disappearance was the puzzle which enlivened our dinner; I satisfied no one's curiosity. I left them at three o'clock after the fondest embraces, and I traveled all night; I stopped at Monte Cassino,[47] which I had never seen, and I was delighted to have done so, for I found there Prince Xavier of Saxony under the name of Count Lausitz,[48] with Signora Spinucci,[49] a lady of Fermo, whom the Prince had married but whose position he did not make known. He had been there for three days. He had had to wait for the Pope's permission for Signora Spinucci, for by the Rule of St. Benedict women were expressly forbidden to enter the monastery, and, since Signora Spinucci refused to comply, the Prince had to send an express messenger to Signor Bianconi[50] in Rome to obtain permission. After seeing everything worth seeing in Monte Cassino and sleeping there, I left to go on to Rome without stopping, for though it was the middle of September it had not yet rained and the air was still noxious. I went to lodge at the inn on the Piazza di Spagna kept by Roland's daughter, the sister of Teresa, the wife of my brother, who was still in Rome with Prince Beloselski.

CHAPTER I

1770. Margherita. La Buonaccorsi. The Duchess of Fiano. Cardinal de Bernis. The Princess of Santa Croce. Marcuccio[1] and his sister. The excommunication attached to the visiting room is abolished.

HAVING ALREADY made up my mind to spend a quiet six months in Rome, confining my activities to learning to know the city and making such acquaintances as doing that should bring me, on the day after I arrived I took a pleasant apartment opposite the palace of the Spanish Ambassador, who was then Monsignor Azpuru;[2] the apartment was the one which had been occupied twenty-seven years earlier by the teacher of languages to whom I had gone for lessons when I was in the service of Cardinal Acquaviva.[3] The landlady of the apartment was the wife of a cook,[4] who came to spend the night with her only once a week. She had a daughter sixteen or seventeen years of age, who, despite her rather too dark complexion, would have been very pretty if smallpox had not deprived her of one eye. She wore a false eye, which, being of a different color from the other and also larger, made her face repulsive. The girl, whose name was Margherita, made no impression on me; even so, I could not refrain from giving her a present, than which none other could have gratified her more. An English oculist who was known as the Chevalier Taylor[5] being in Rome, and lodging on the same square, I took Margherita and her mother to him and, for six zecchini, had her fitted with a porcelain eye which matched the other and could not have looked better. My generosity made Margherita think that, overwhelmed by her beauty in twenty-four hours, I had already fallen in love with her; her mother, being a devout woman, feared to burden her conscience by judging my motive too unfavorably. I was not long in learning all this from Margherita herself, when we reached the point of an intimate acquaintance. I came to terms for dinner and supper without any luxury. Rich in the possession of three thousand zecchini, I determined to pursue a course of conduct which would assure me that I could live in Rome not only without needing anyone but even cutting a respectable figure.

The following morning I found letters at almost all the post offices,[6] and found, too, that the head of the Banca Belloni,[7] who had long known me, had already received notice of the bill of exchange of which I was the bearer. Signor Dandolo,[8] always my faithful friend, sent me two letters of recommendation written by the same Venetian nobleman, Signor Zulian,[9] who had recommended me to the Venetian Ambassador in Madrid, Signor Mocenigo, with the consent of the State Inquisitors. One of his letters was addressed to Signor Erizzo,[10] the Venetian Ambassador, which greatly pleased me. He was the brother of the Erizzo who had been Ambassador in Paris. The other was addressed to his sister, the Duchess of Fiano.[11] I saw that I should soon make my way into all the great houses in Rome; I was delighted at the thought of presenting myself to Cardinal de Bernis after I had become well known in the city. I engaged neither a carriage nor a servant; it is not necessary in Rome, where both can be procured at a moment's notice when they are needed.

The first person to whom I presented my letter was the Duchess of Fiano, who, having heard from her brother that I would call on her, received me most graciously. She was an extremely ugly woman, not at all rich, but with an excellent heart; having very little wit, she had taken the course of being amusingly malicious to prove that she had a great deal of it. Her husband the Duke, who used the name of Ottoboni, to which he had a right, and who had married her to obtain an heir, was impotent, which, in the language of Rome, is babilano;[12] this was her first confidence to me, vouchsafed the third time I saw her; but she did not say it in a way to make me conclude that she did not love him or that she wanted to present herself as a woman to be pitied, for it appeared that she said it only to make fun of a confessor she had who had threatened to refuse her absolution if she continued to do everything she could to make him potent. She gave a supper every evening to her circle of intimates, composed of some seven or eight people, to which I was not admitted until a week or ten days later, when, all of them having met me, they seemed to value my company. Her husband, who did not like society, supped alone in his room. The cavalier who danced attendance on the Duchess was the Prince of Santa Croce,[13] whose wife's cavalier was Cardinal de Bernis. The Princess, daughter of the Marchese Falconieri,[14] was very young, pretty, extremely animated, and a woman to please all who came near her; however, proud of possessing the Cardinal, she let no one hope for the honor of taking his place. Her husband the Prince was a handsome man, elegant in his manners and with a sufficiency of intelligence; but he used it only in commercial speculations; he believed, and rightly, that a nobleman does not derogate from his birth by availing himself of all the advantages to which it entitles him. Not liking to spend, he attended the Duchess of Fiano because he spent nothing, and he felt that he was in no danger of falling in love with her.

Though not bigoted, he was a fanatical Jesuit, and indeed a Jesuit of the short robe,[15] like Président d'Éguilles,[16] brother of the Marquis d'Argens, whom I had known in Aix. As soon as, two or three weeks after I arrived, he heard me complain of the difficulties a man of letters encountered when he went to work in the Roman libraries,[17] the Minerva, for example, or still more the Vatican, he offered to introduce me to the Superior of the professed house at Il Gesù and at Sant'Ignazio.[18] One of the librarians presented me once and for all to all the assistants, and from then on I found I could not only go to the library on any day and at any hour but could also take home whatever books I needed, only writing the title of the book on a sheet of paper which I left on the table at which I was writing. I was brought candles when it appeared that I did not have light enough, and the courtesy I was shown even extended to my being given the key to a small door by which I could enter the library at all hours, very often without being seen. The Jesuits were always the most courteous of all the regular ecclesiastics of our religion, and even, if I may say so, the only courteous ones; but during the crisis in which they were then involved they carried their courtesy so far that they impressed me as servile. The King of Spain[19] wanted the order suppressed, and they knew that the Pope had promised [20] him that he would do it; but, sure that the final blow would never fall, they were unafraid. They could never persuade themselves that the Pope could have a courage which, according to them, surpassed the moral strength of mankind. They even managed to have him indirectly warned that he did not have the necessary authority to suppress their order without convoking a Council; but all was in vain. The Pope found it difficult to make up his mind because he knew that decreeing the suppression of the Company would be decreeing his own death. He did not bring himself to it until he saw that his honor was seriously endangered. The King of Spain, who was the stubbornest of all sovereigns, wrote him in his own hand that, if he did not suppress the order, he would print and publish in every language of Europe the letters he had written him when he was a Cardinal and on the strength of which he had had him created Supreme Pontiff of the Christian religion. A man of a different stamp from Ganganelli could have answered the King that the Pope was not obliged to do what he had promised as a Cardinal, and the Jesuits would have supported the doctrine, which is not the most specious of all those put forward by the adherents of probabilism;[21] however, in his heart Ganganelli had no love for the Jesuits, he was a Franciscan, he was not born a gentleman, his manners were rustic, and he was not strong-minded enough to defy the shame he would have felt at finding himself exposed as a man of ambition and capable of breaking the promise he had made to a great monarch in order to become the occupant of the Chair of St. Peter.

I laugh at those who say that the Pope poisoned himself by taking counterpoisons. It is true that, always afraid that he would be poisoned, he took antidotes and preservative drugs. Being wholly ignorant of pharmacy, he was gullible in that respect; but I am in a position to say that it is morally certain (if there is such a thing as moral certainty) that Pope Ganganelli died from being given poison[22] and not from his alexipharmics.[23] The grounds for my certainty are as follows:

At the time when I was in Rome, which was the third year of Ganganelli's pontificate, a woman from Viterbo,[24] who made enigmatic predictions with surprising particulars, was sent to prison. In obscure terms she predicted the destruction of the Company of Jesus without naming the time at which it was to occur; but what she said perfectly clearly was this: "The Company of Jesus will be destroyed only by a Pope who will reign five years, three months, and three days, exactly as long as Sixtus V,[25] not a day more, not a day less." Most of those who read this prophecy made light of it, and nothing more was said of the Sibyl, who was nevertheless imprisoned. I ask my reader to tell me if a man of judgment, if a man who can think, can doubt that the Pope was poisoned when, at his death, the prophecy was found to have been fulfilled. In such a case moral certainty becomes the same as material certainty; the mind which made the woman from Viterbo its mouthpiece was clever enough to inform the world that, if the Jesuits were suppressed, they would not fail to avenge themselves. The very powerful man who poisoned the Pope could certainly have poisoned him before he suppressed the order; but we must believe that he never thought he would be capable of it. It is obvious that, if he had not suppressed the order, he would not have poisoned him, and so the prophecy would not have been false. Let us note that Ganganelli was a monk of the Order of St. Francis, like Sixtus V, and that the one was no more of noble birth than the other. The strange thing is that after the Pope's death the Sibyl was declared insane and released from prison and nothing more was heard of her, and that, despite the fact that the prophecy I have mentioned was widely known, men of learning and noblemen alike all insisted on saying that it was true that the Pope had been poisoned, but that it was by his alexipharmics, which he constantly took and even without his faithful friend Bontempi[26] being present. I ask any thinking man what inducement the Pope, unless he was insane, could have to fulfill the woman of Viterbo's prophecy to the letter. Those who will tell me that the whole thing could have been the result of pure chance will strike me dumb, for it is a possibility which I cannot deny, but I shall continue to argue as I have always argued. The poisoning of Pope Ganganelli was the last example of their power to which the Jesuits, even after their extinction, treated the world. The unpardonable mistake they made was not to have killed him before that, for true policy consists only in foresight and precaution, and the worst of all politicians is he who does not know that there is nothing on earth which, in case of doubt, precaution must not sacrifice to foresight.

The second time that the Prince of Santa Croce saw me at the Duchess of Fiano's he asked me ex abrupto ("without preamble") why I did not go to see Cardinal de Bernis; I replied that I intended to go there the next day.

"Go, for I have never heard His Eminence speak of anyone with as much regard as he does of you."

"He put me under an infinite obligation to him eighteen years ago;[27] and I would gladly risk my life to convince His Eminence that I have not forgotten what I owe him."

"Then go to see him, and we shall all be delighted."

The Cardinal received me the next day with every sign of the unfeigned pleasure it gave him to see me again.[28] He praised me for my reticence in speaking of him to the Prince of Santa Croce at the Duchess's, being sure that I would say nothing about the circumstances of our friendship in Venice. I told him that, except for having grown stouter, I found him as handsome and fresh-looking as when he had left Paris twelve years earlier, but he replied that he felt different in every way.

"I am fifty-five years old," he said, "and I am reduced to a vegetable diet."

"Is it in order to keep down the inclination of the flesh for the work of love?"

"I wish people believed it; but I do not think it deceives anyone."

He was delighted when he learned that I had a letter to the Venetian Ambassador, which I had not yet delivered. He promised me that he would approach him in a way which would assure me of a good reception from him.

"Meanwhile," he said, "I will begin breaking the ice tomorrow. You shall dine with me, and he shall learn of it."

I told him I had plenty of money, and I saw that he was delighted to know it, and even more pleased when I told him I was all alone and determined to be on my good behavior and to live without ostentation. He said that he would write M. M.[29] of my presence in Rome and my resolve. I amused him very much by telling him the story of my adventure with the nun in Chambéry.[30] He said that I should not hesitate to ask the Prince of Santa Croce to introduce me to the Princess, with whom we could spend pleasant hours, but not of the sort we used to spend in Venice, for she had no resemblance to M. M.

"Yet she provides Your Eminence with your only agreeable occupation."

"Yes, for want of anything better. You will see."

The next day as we rose from table the Cardinal told me that Signor Zulian had mentioned me to the Ambassador, Erizzo, who had shown the greatest desire to make my acquaintance; and I was very well satisfied with the reception he gave me. The Cavaliere, brother of the Procurator Erizzo, who is still alive, was a man of great intelligence, a good citizen, very eloquent, and a consummate politician. He congratulated me on being on my travels, and on being protected by the State Inquisitors instead of persecuted by them, for Signor Zulian had recommended me to him with their consent. He kept me for dinner, and he told me to come there whenever I had nothing better to do.

It was at the Duchess's on that same evening that I asked the Prince of Santa Croce to introduce me to the Princess; he replied that she wished it, the Cardinal having talked of me for an hour on the previous evening. He said that I could go there every day, either at eleven o'clock in the morning or at two in the afternoon. I went there the next day at two o'clock; she was in bed, where she took a siesta every day, and, since I had the privilege of being a person of no importance, she had me shown in at once. In a quarter of an hour I saw everything that she was: young, pretty, gay, animated, curious, merry, always talking, asking questions, and never having the patience to hear out the answers. I saw that the young woman was a perfect plaything to amuse the mind and the heart of a voluptuous and discreet man who was burdened with important affairs and needed distraction. The Cardinal saw her only on the three regular visits he paid her every day: when she rose in the morning and he went to see if she had slept well; every afternoon, when he went to drink coffee with her in her apartment; and every evening at the assembly in her palace. He played a game of two-handed piquet with her, at which he saw to it that he lost six Roman zecchini[31] every day, neither more nor less. This made the Princess the richest young woman in Rome. Her husband, though so lacking in magnanimity as to be jealous, had practical intelligence enough not to object to his wife's enjoying an income of eighteen hundred francs a month without doing anything which could lead either her to reproach herself or others to speak ill of her, for the thing was done in public and the money was honestly won at a game success in which could be attributed only to luck.

So the Prince of Santa Croce could not but cultivate and set the highest value on the Cardinal's friendship for his charming Princess, who, being extremely fecund, gave him a child not only every year but sometimes every nine months, despite the fact that the physician Salicetti[32] had assured her that proper care for her health demanded that she should not become pregnant again until after the six weeks of discharge after her lying-in had elapsed.

In addition the Prince enjoyed the advantage of being able to receive all the fabrics he wanted from Lyons, without giving any occasion for objections on the part of the Grand Treasurer,[33] who was then Monsignor Braschi[34] (now the Pope), since they were addressed to the Cardinal-Ambassador of France. Add, too, that the Cardinal's friendship for his house protected him against all those who would have annoyed him by courting his wife. The man who was in love with her at that time was the Constable Colonna,[35] whom he had taken by surprise in a room in his palace conversing with her during one of those quarters of an hour when she was morally certain that the ring at the door did not announce the arrival of the incumbent Eminence. No sooner had the Prince-Constable left than the offended husband told the Princess to be ready to leave for the country with him the next day. The Princess protested that such an unexpected, unwonted, and unprepared departure was only a whim to which her honor did not permit her to yield; but his mind was made up, and she would have had to obey if the Cardinal himself, having arrived and heard the whole story from the ingenuous and innocent beauty, had not proved to the husband that he could, and under the circumstances must, go to the country alone, leaving his Princess in Rome, where she would take greater care in future to avoid encounters which were always troublesome and of a nature to give rise to unfortunate misunderstandings likely to destroy the peace of the family.

In less than a month I became the person whose presence discommoded none of the three chief actors in the play. Taking no part in the dispute while it raged, listening, approving everything, and, when it was over, always declaring that the victor was in the right, I became almost as necessary to them as the marker is to the billiard player. I occupied the dreary time which follows such quarrels with stories or amusing comments; everyone felt better, everyone attributed it to me that the thing had been patched up so quickly, and I was rewarded by never being unwelcome at any time and in any situation.

In the Princess, the Prince, and the Cardinal, I saw three nobly innocent and inoffensive souls going their[36] way without harming anyone or doing anything to subvert the peace and the just laws of society in general.

The Duchess of Fiano, conceiving that her possessing the husband of her whose possession he allowed the Cardinal to enjoy showed that her own merits were of the highest, and not a little vain of what she thought Rome must be saying in consequence, whereas in fact no one was taken in, was angry with me for being stupid enough to see everything through rose-colored glasses. She would never have supposed me so lacking in intelligence, she was amazed that I did not see that only an unconquerable jealousy kept the Princess of Santa Croce from ever calling on her; she spoke to me one day so hotly to convince me that such was the case that I saw that if I did not admit it I should lose her good graces. As for the Princess's charms, I had had to grant her from the beginning that it was incomprehensible how they had succeeded in dazzling the Cardinal, for she was the thinnest creature alive and none of her sex in Rome had a mind that was giddier or more incapable of reasoning. What was, however, the incontrovertible truth was that the Princess of Santa Croce was a jewel perfectly adapted to make a voluptuous and philosophical lover like the Cardinal happy. At certain moments I was more inclined to wonder at his good luck in possessing such a treasure than at the eminent dignity to which Fortune and his innate qualities had raised him. I loved the Princess, but, never allowing myself to hope, I remained within the bounds which assured me that I should forever keep the place which I then held. Trying to attain something more, I should have risked losing everything, for I should have offended the lady's pride and shocked the delicacy of her lover, whom age and the sacred purple had, despite his philosophy, made a different man from what he had been when we had shared possession of M. M.[37] It must be added that the Cardinal had always told me that he felt for her only the fondness of a father; it was enough to show me that he would have taken offense at my attempting to be, or to become, anything more than the favorite among all her most humble servants. I had to be satisfied and consider myself very fortunate that she feared me no more than she did her chambermaid. Indeed, to be as agreeable to her as I could, I pretended not to be looking at her when she knew that I saw her. The course one must pursue to gain the good graces of a woman who pampers herself is not easy to find, especially if she has a king or a cardinal dancing attendance on her.

The life I had been leading during the month I had been in Rome was everything I could want in the way of tranquillity. At my lodging Margherita had found the way to capture my interest by her attentions. Since I had no servant, she was in my room morning and evening; I looked at her, very well pleased with the present of the false eye I had made her, which looked natural and real to all who had not known her as one-eyed. The girl was extremely intelligent, though completely uneducated, and enormously vain in the matter of dress. With no particular intention, I played up to her by holding long, amusing conversations with her morning and night and making her little presents; and, by giving her money, I catered to her love of finery which made her looked at in the Church of the Holy Apostles[38] every feast day and Sunday when she went to mass. In a few days I became aware of two things: first, that she was astonished that, loving her, I never came to a declaration in words or in acts; second, that, if I loved her, I could conquer her without much difficulty. The latter I could not but divine when, urged to tell me the story of all the little adventures she must have had from the age of eleven to her then age of seventeen or eighteen, she told me anecdotes which I greatly enjoyed and which she could not have told me without trampling on every feeling of modesty. I had reached this point with her by giving her three or four paoli every time I thought she had been frank; I told her so; and I gave her nothing when I felt sure that she concealed the most interesting circumstances of the intrigue. By this course I forced her to confess to me that she no longer had her maidenhead, that a charming girl whose name was Buonaccorsi and who came to see her every Sunday and feast day no longer had hers either, and what man it was who had conquered them both. She assured me that she did not make love with the Abate Ceruti,[39] whose room was next to mine and to whom she had to go whenever her mother did not have time enough. This Piedmontese Abate was handsome, learned, and in general a man of prepossessing qualities, but he was poor, burdened with debts, and in very ill repute in Rome because of an ugly story which everyone had heard and of which he was the unfortunate hero. It was said that he had confided to an Englishman who was in love with Princess Lanti[40] that she was in need of two hundred zecchini, and that the Englishman had given them to him to give to her, but that the Abate had kept them for himself. This black fraud had been revealed in the course of a conversation between the lady and the Englishman, who, after telling her that he was ready to do anything for her, had assured her that he considered the two hundred zecchini he had sent her nothing. The lady, very much surprised, having denied all knowledge of it, the Englishman had prudently not insisted; but the Abate had been suddenly banished from the Lanti palace and the magnanimous Englishman had done no more than refuse to see him again.

The Abate, who was one of the people Bianconi employed to write the Roman Ephemerides[41] which came out every week, had become my friend as soon as I came to stay in Margherita's house. I had noticed that he was in love with her, and it was a matter of indifference to me, for I did not love her, but I should not have believed that Margherita treated him unkindly. The girl assured me that she could not bear him and that she was very much displeased whenever she had to enter his room. The Abate was already under obligations to me. He had borrowed some twenty scudi from me, promising that he would return them three or four days later, and three weeks had passed without his giving them back; but I did not ask him for them, and I would even have lent him another twenty without his asking me for them, but for what happened next.

When I supped at the Duchess of Fiano's I came home late, and Margherita would be waiting for me. Her mother would be asleep, and, wanting to be diverted, I would keep her with me for an hour or two, regardless of the fact that our amusements made noise enough to disturb the Abate Ceruti, who, separated from the room in which we were entertaining ourselves only by a board partition, could not but hear even what we said and painfully resent our gay conversations when Margherita did nothing to quench the fire with which he burned for her.

Coming home one evening toward midnight, I was very much surprised to find, instead of Margherita, her mother.

"Where is your daughter?"

"My daughter is asleep. It goes against my conscience to let her stay in your room all night."

"She stays only until, being ready to go to bed, I tell her to leave, and this change offends me, for it shows me only too clearly your unjustified suspicions. What can Margherita have said to you? If she has complained, she lied, and I will leave your house tomorrow."

"You would be wrong. Margherita has said nothing to me, on the contrary she maintains that you only joke with her."

"Exactly so. Do you see any harm in joking?"

"No, but you might do something else."

"And on that assumption, meanwhile, you base an unworthy suspicion which should burden your conscience, if you are a good Christian."

"God keep me from suspecting my neighbor, but I was informed that your laughter and joking are carried to such extremes that there can be no doubt that your meetings are immoral."

"So it was my neighbor the Abate who was indiscreet enough to set you worrying."

"I cannot tell you from whom I know it, but I know it."

"So much the better for you. I shall remove to other lodgings tomorrow, and thus put your conscience at rest."

"But cannot I render you the services my daughter does?"

"Certainly not. Your daughter amuses me, and I need it. You are not a woman to amuse me. I leave tomorrow, I tell you. You have insulted me, and it must not happen again."

"I should be sorry to have you leave, because of my husband, who would ask me the reason, and I should not know what to tell him."

"What your husband may say about it is nothing to me. I shall leave tomorrow. Be so good as to go, for it is time I went to bed."

"Permit me to serve you, to take off your shoes."

"Neither that nor anything else. If you want me to be served, send Margherita."

"She is asleep."

"Wake her."

At that she left, and three minutes later in comes Margherita, with nothing much on but her shift and without her false eye, which she had not had time to put in, at which I burst out laughing.

"I was asleep, and my mother told me to come and persuade you not to leave our house, for my father would think the worst of it."

"I will stay, but you shall continue to come to my room alone."

"Gladly, but we must not laugh any more, for the Abate complained of it."

"So it was the Abate who told your mother?"

"Can you have any doubt of it? Our joy made him bitter. Our gaiety offended his passion."

"He is a wretch who needs to be punished. If we laughed day before yesterday, we will laugh even more tonight."

She agreed; whereupon we played every imaginable trick, accompanied by constant laughter, which must have driven the talebearer to despair. At the height of our romp, which must have gone on for an hour, the door opens; it was Margherita's mother who entered, expecting to catch us in the act. She sees me with Margherita's cap on my head, and Margherita with a pair of mustaches which I had painted with ink. She could not help laughing too.

"Well," I said, "do you think us great criminals?"

"No, and I see that you are right; but consider that your innocent orgies keep your neighbor from sleeping."

"Let him go and sleep somewhere else. I shall do as I please. I will even tell you that you have only to choose between him and me. I will stay in your house only on condition that you turn him out, and I will take his room for myself"

"I cannot turn him out until the end of the month; but I foresee that he will say things to my husband which will make trouble in our household."

"He will say nothing to your husband, of that I am sure. Let me take care of it. I will speak to the Abate myself tomorrow morning, and he will leave your house of his own free will without your having to say anything to him. And that, my good woman, will save you from even greater worries. In future, fear for your daughter when you know that she is alone in a room with a man and they are not talking and not laughing. Then you can be sure that they are doing something serious."

After this little sermon she left well satisfied and went off to bed. Margherita, congratulating me in advance on the brilliant move that I had promised to make the next day, became so gay that I could not keep from doing her the justice she deserved; she spent an hour in my bed without laughing, then left, proud of her victory.

The next morning early I entered the Abate's room, where, after reproaching him for his talebearing, which he could not deny, I told him in so many words that he must find other lodgings at once or take the consequences of my declaring myself his enemy, beginning by implacably demanding the twenty scudi he owed me, undeterred by the fact that he could not pay them. After beating about the bush for some time, he told me that he could not leave without paying what he owed the innkeeper and without having money to pay a month in advance on another room which he would at once go to look for; and to get rid of all these difficulties I gave him another twenty scudi. So the whole affair ended well;[42] I found myself better lodged, in full possession of Margherita, who soon put me in that of the charming Buonaccorsi, whose attractions were much greater than hers.

The two girls introduced me to the young hero who had had the art to seduce them both. He was a tailor's apprentice fifteen years of age, handsome, short, but so generously endowed by nature that I had to say they were right when I saw the object the sight of which had deprived them of the power to resist. The youth was very well-mannered; I found in him a refinement which declared him to be above his station. He loved neither Margherita nor La Buonaccorsi. Seeing them together, and hence without constraint, he had thought they were curious about what they did not see, and he had satisfied their curiosity. But the satisfaction of their sight was followed by desires for something more tangible; the youth became aware of it, and, being polite and magnanimous, he took the first step by offering them everything in his power. Thereupon the two girls consulted together, and, pretending only to humor him, obtained the enjoyment of the splendid object.

Loving them both, and feeling the greatest friendship for the youth, I often arranged to have the pleasure of watching him performing amorous exploits, very glad to see that, instead of being jealous of his enjoyment and his abilities, I felt their beneficent influence to the point of sharing in the festivities with an increase in enjoyment which the sight of the youth, handsomer than Antinoüs,[43] procured me. I outfitted him with linen and some fine coats, and before long he trusted me completely, confiding to me all that filled his heart, in love with a girl on whom his entire happiness depended and whose love made him miserable, because she was cloistered; and, since he could obtain her only by marrying her, he was in despair, for, earning only a paolo a day, he had not enough even to live on alone. Constantly telling me of the rare beauty of the girl he adored, he made me want to see her, and I saw her; but before telling my reader how it came about I must give him an account of my situation in Rome at the time when I made this acquaintance.

Having gone to the Capitol on the day on which prizes were to be conferred on young students of painting and drawing,[44] I saw the painter Mengs, who, with Pompeo Battoni[45] and two or three others, was to decide which students deserved the preference. Not having forgotten how Mengs had treated me in Spain,[46] I was going to pretend I did not see him, when, greatly to my surprise, he came up to me.

"Despite what happened between us in Madrid," he said, "we can forget it all in Rome and speak without tainting our honor."

"Why not?" I replied, "provided we do not raise the subject of our quarrel, for I, at least, could not discuss it coolly."

"If you had known Madrid as I do, and the necessity I was under to give no opening to evil tongues, you would not have forced me to do what I did. Learn that I was believed to be a Protestant, and that to add color to the suspicion I had only to show myself unconcerned by your behavior. Come to dine with me tomorrow, and we will make peace under the auspices of Bacchus. It will be a family dinner; I have heard that you do not see your brother, and I can assure you that you will not find him in my house,[47] for if I received him all the decent people who frequent it would forsake it."

I did not fail to go there. My brother left Rome some time later, still in company with Prince Beloselski, the Russian Envoy to Dresden, with whom he had gone there, and still without having obtained what he demanded to clear his honor. Senator Rezzonico[48] was inexorable. We saw each other only three or four times.

Five or six days before he left, I was surprised to see my brother the Abate[49] appear before me, dirty, in rags, and unbashedly demanding that I help him.

"Where have you come from?"

"From Venice, where I could no longer make a living."

"And how do you expect to make a living in Rome?"

"By saying mass and teaching French."

"You, teach French? You don't even know your own language."

"I know it, and I know French, and I already have two pupils."

"Who are they?"

"The son and daughter of the proprietor of the inn where I am staying; but you must help me at first."

"I will not give you a soldo; leave my presence."

I paid no attention to his protests, I finished dressing, and I left, telling Margherita to lock my apartment. The wretch went to the Duchess of Fiano's and sent in his name; she received him to find out what it was about. He implored her to take pity on him and persuade me to help him, and she dismissed him, promising that she would speak to me. I felt ashamed and annoyed when she mentioned it to me that evening. I begged her not to speak of it again, and even not to receive him again. I gave her a brief account of all the base acts to which he had descended and told her what I had to fear from him, and she refused to listen to him after that. He went about reviling me to all my friends, even the Abate Gama,[50] who had rented the fourth floor of a house opposite the Church of Trinità dei Monti; everyone told me I ought to help him or make him leave Rome, and it annoyed me. It was the Abate Ceruti who, ten or twelve days after going to lodge elsewhere, came to tell me that if I did not want to see my brother begging in the streets I must do something for him; he said that I could make provision for him outside of Rome, and that he was willing to go there if I would give him three paoli a day. I consented; but the Abate Ceruti arranged the thing in a way which greatly pleased me. He spoke to a parish priest who was then in Rome and who served a church belonging to a Franciscan nunnery. The priest took my brother with him and promised him a testone[51] a day to say a mass in his church every day, in payment for which he would receive the testone, and other worthwhile perquisites if he was a success at preaching, of which the nuns in his convent were passionately fond. So my brother left, and I did not care if he knew that his three paoli a day came from me. I gave the Abate Ceruti all my old shirts to give to him and an old black coat, and I refused to see him. The place to which he went was Palestrina,[52] the ancient Praeneste, which was the site of the famous Temple of Fortune. As long as I remained in Rome he never failed to receive the nine scudi a month; but after I left he went back to Rome, then left it for another convent, where he died suddenly, thirteen or fourteen years ago.[53] He may have poisoned himself.

Medini[54] had been in Rome ever since I arrived there, but we never saw each other. He lodged on the Strada delle Orseline[55] in the house of one of the Pope's light-cavalrymen, where, living on gaming, he tried to cheat all the foreigners who arrived. Having accumulated some money, he had sent to Mantua for his mistress and her mother and another daughter she had, twelve or thirteen years of age. Thinking that he could do much better in furnished lodgings, he had taken a fine apartment on the Piazza di Spagna, five or six houses away from the one in which I was staying. I knew nothing of all this.

One Sunday when I had gone to dine at the Venetian Ambassador's, His Excellency told me that I should be dining with Count Manuzzi,[56] who had just arrived from Paris and had been delighted to learn that I was in Rome.

"I imagine you know all about him; be so good as to tell me who the Count is, for I am to present him to the Holy Father day after tomorrow."

"I met him in Madrid with Ambassador Mocenigo; he makes a good impression, he is modest, handsome, polite—that is all I know."

"When he was in Madrid was he presented at Court?"

"I believe so."

"I think not. You are not telling me all you know—but it doesn't matter. I risk nothing by presenting him to the Pope. He says he is descended from the famous thirteenth-century traveler Manuzzi[57] and from the famous printers[58] of the same name who did so much honor to literature. He showed me the anchor[59] in his coat of arms, which has sixteen quarterings."

Greatly astonished that a man who had carried vengeance to the point of trying to have me assassinated should speak of me as of an intimate friend, I determined to conceal my feelings and wait to see what turn the thing would take. So I saw him appear without showing any sign of my justified resentment, and when, after paying the Ambassador the usual compliments, he came to me ready to embrace me I received him with open arms and asked him for news of the Ambassador.[60] He talked a great deal at table, telling any number of lies, all of them to my honor, about everything I had done in Madrid, flattering himself (I conclude) that by lying he obliged me to lie and thus inviting me to do as much for him. In no position to do anything else, I swallowed all these bitter pills, but I was determined to have it out with him the next day at the latest.

The person who interested me, and who had come to dine at the Ambassador's with Manuzzi, was a Frenchman who went by the name of the Chevalier de Neuville.[61] He had come to Rome to obtain the annulment of the marriage of a lady who was in a convent in Mantua; he had a special recommendation to Cardinal Galli.[62] Telling us a quantity of amusing stories, he diverted the entire company; and when we left the Ambassador's house I did not refuse to get into his carriage with Manuzzi to take a drive until evening. Toward dusk he told us that he would take us to the house of a pretty woman where we would sup and where there was a bank at faro. The carriage stops at a house on the Piazza di Spagna, not very far from mine, we go up to the third floor, and I find myself face to face with Count Medini and his mistress, whom the French Chevalier had praised and whom I think of little account. Medini gives me a friendly greeting and thanks the Frenchman for having persuaded me to forget the past and come to his house. The Frenchman says that he knows nothing about it, but I change the subject and begin observing the company, which was gradually assembling.

When Medini thought there were punters enough he sat down at a big table, put five or six hundred scudi in gold and notes in front of him, and began dealing. Manuzzi lost all the money he had, Neuville won half the amount in the bank, and I did not play. After supper, Medini having asked the Frenchman for his revenge, Manuzzi asked me for a hundred zecchini, or for what I had if I did not have that much. I gave him a hundred zecchini, which he lost in less than an hour, and Neuville came within twenty or thirty zecchini of breaking the bank. We all went home. Manuzzi was lodging at my sister-in-law's,[63] Roland's daughter. I saw him in my room the next morning just as I was dressing to pay him a visit with an intention which would have put us both in danger. After returning my hundred zecchini, he embraced me, and, showing me a letter of credit for a large sum on Belloni, he offered me all the money I might need and, not giving me a chance to say anything, he argued to me that we should forget everything and be good friends for the rest of our lives. My heart betrayed my mind, as has happened to me on many other occasions, and I agreed to the peace which he offered me and asked of me. On the next day but one I went to dine with him alone. The French Chevalier arrived at the end of our dinner, and after him the unlucky Medini, who persuaded the three of us to play, each dealing in turn. We played until nightfall, and the winner was Manuzzi. He won twice what he had lost the evening before; my losses were inconsiderable. Neuville, however, lost four hundred zecchini, and Medini, who had lost only fifty, wanted to jump out the window.

A few days later Manuzzi left for Naples, after giving two hundred zecchini to Medini's mistress, who had gone to sup with him alone; but the two hundred zecchini did not keep Medini from being arrested for debts amounting to more than a thousand scudi. He wrote me some very urgent letters from prison, trying to persuade me to help him; but the only effect they had on me was to induce me to look after what he called his family, in return for the favors granted me by his mistress's young sister. At this time the Emperor arrived in Rome with his brother the Grand Duke of Tuscany;[64] and, some gentleman in the suite of one or the other of the two princes having made the girl's acquaintance, Medini was released from prison and left Rome a few days later. We shall return to him in five or six months.

I continued the same course of life; in the evening at the Duchess of Fiano's, every afternoon at the Princess of Santa Croce's, and at my inn, where I had Margherita, La Buonaccorsi, and the young tailor, whose name was Marcuccio[65] and who talked to me so much about his heart's desire that I became curious to know the object of his passion.

The girl he loved was in a sort of convent, which she had charitably been allowed to enter at the age of ten years and which she could not leave except to marry with the permission of the Cardinal who superintended the economy and directed the policy of the pious foundation. When the girls who were kept there left the establishment they were given two hundred Roman scudi, which they brought as their dowry to the men they married. Marcuccio also had his sister in the convent and sometimes went to see her. She came to the grating with the governess who was in charge of her and who saw to her education; even though Marcuccio was her brother, the regulations of the convent did not allow her to go to the grating alone. One day five or six months earlier his sister had come to the grating with a schoolmate, a young girl whom Marcuccio had never seen. It was on that day that he fell in love with her. Having to stay in his shop at work on working days, he went to see his sister every holiday, but she came to the grating with the object of his devotion only when chance decreed it. In five or six months he had had the good fortune to see her no more than eight or ten times. His sister knew that he adored her, and she was more than willing to do anything she could for him; but she had no authority to bring her down to the grating, and she did not dare ask her governess, who could do her the favor, to grant it, for if she had had any suspicion that love entered in she would no longer have allowed her to go down even by chance. So I decided to pay Marcuccio's sister a visit with him.

On the way he told me that the establishment was very poor; that the women who directed it could not properly be called nuns, for they had taken no vows and they did not even wear a regular habit; nevertheless, they were not tempted to leave their prison, for poverty would reduce them to begging for their bread or trying to find positions as servants in some house or other. The girls who had reached the age of puberty would run away if they could; but the house was so well guarded that it was impossible to escape from it.

We arrived at a vast, ill-built house standing near one of the gates of Rome[66] in a square which, because it led nowhere and so had to be sought out purposely, was solitary and deserted. On entering the visiting room, I was surprised to see the structure of the cruel gratings. The square apertures were so small that one could not put one's hand in except at the risk of scraping the skin from the back of it from wrist to knuckles; nor was that enough: the barbaric, tyrannous, and scandalous grating had another of exactly the same construction a foot behind it; but it was not easy to see it, for, though the visiting room was light enough for us who had come to call on the poor recluses, the inner part of it, where they received their callers, was nearly dark. The sight made me shudder.

"Where and how," I asked Marcuccio, "did you see the mistress of your heart, whereas I see nothing inside there but darkness?"

"By means of a candle, which the nun is not allowed to light on pain of excommunication except to receive relatives."

"So she will come with a candle this time?"

"I doubt it, for the portress must have announced that I have someone with me."

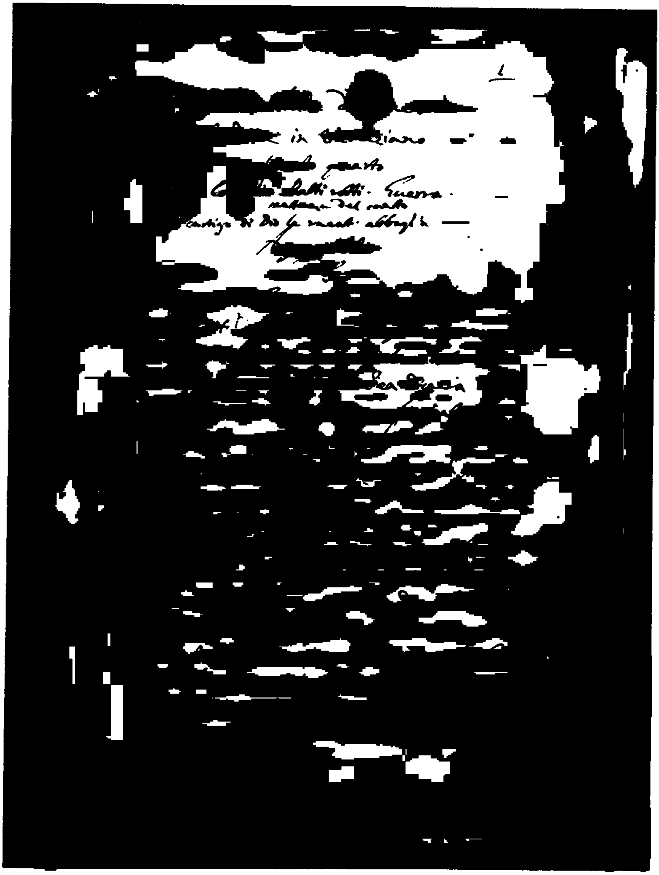
"But how did you have the privilege of seeing your mistress, to whom you are not related?"

"The first time she came down she had slipped away, and my sister's governess, who is goodhearted, said nothing; and the other times she came because my sister begged her governess to let her."

What happened was that they came down without a light and that there were three of them. I could never persuade the governess to go for a candle, not so much for fear of excommunication as for fear of being betrayed by a spy and punished by the Superioress. I saw that it was on my account that poor Marcuccio could not see his idol. I offered to leave, but he would not let me. I spent an infuriating hour, but one not without interest. The voice of my young friend's sister went to my soul; I concluded that it must be by the voice that the blind fall in love, and that their love would become as strong as that which had its origin in sight. The governess in charge of Marcuccio's sister was a young woman still under thirty years of age. She told me that when the girls reached the age of twenty-five they were made governesses of the younger girls, and that at the age of thirty-five they could leave their prison not to return; but that those who took that course were very few, for they feared destitution.

"Then you have many old women?"

"There are a hundred of us, and the number never decreases, for at every death a new recruit is brought in."



Casanova's Translation of the Iliad

"And the girls who leave to marry—how have they managed to fall in love with their husbands?"

"In all the twenty years I have been here, I have seen only four girls leave to marry, and they did not meet their husbands until after they left. Any man who asks our protector the Cardinal for one of us is a desperate fool who needs a hundred zecchini; but the Cardinal will not grant him the favor he asks unless he is sure that he practices a trade which will enable him to live well with his wife."

"And what choice is he given?"

"He states the age the girl must be, and the abilities he expects her to have, and the Cardinal leaves it to the Superioress."

"I suppose you are well fed and comfortably lodged?"

"Neither. Three thousand scudi a year cannot feed a hundred people and supply their clothing and all their needs. The ones who earn by the work of their hands are the most fortunate."

"And who are those who ask permission to put a poor girl in this prison?"

"A poor relative, a devout mother or father, who fears that the girl will succumb to sin. For this reason girls are not accepted here unless they are already very pretty."

"Who pronounces on their prettiness?"

"Relatives, some ecclesiastic, a monk, the priest of the girl's parish, and in the last instance the Cardinal, who, if he does not think the child pretty, sends her away, for an ugly girl is believed to run no risk by remaining in the world. So you can be sure that, unhappy as we are here, we curse all those who declared us pretty."

"I am sorry for you. I am amazed that a man cannot obtain permission to see you openly so as to have a reason for asking for one of you in marriage."

"The Cardinal says that even he cannot give such a permission, since breaking the conditions of the foundation entails excommunication."

"Whoever established this house must be in hell."

"We all think so; and Our Lord the Pope ought to take the thing in hand."

I gave the girl ten scudi, saying that, since it was impossible to see her, I could not promise to come again, and I left with Marcuccio, who was all apologies for having made me waste my time.

"My dear friend," I said, "I foresee that I shall never see either your young mistress or your sister, whose voice greatly interested me."

"I cannot believe that your ten scudi will not work wonders."

"I cannot believe that there is not another visiting room."

"There is; but anyone who is not a priest and dares to enter it is excommunicated, unless he has permission from the Most Holy Father."

I could not understand how the house could be tolerated, for I saw how hard it must be for the recluses to find husbands, and I thought it impossible that it would be allowed to exist once it was known that the regulations of the establishment seemed made on purpose to prevent their marrying. I saw that since each of the recluses was assigned a dowry of two hundred scudi, the founder of the house must have counted on at least two marriages a year, and hence that someone must be stealing all that was saved by the girls not marrying. I communicated my thoughts to Cardinal de Bernis in the presence of the Princess, who, very much concerned for the unfortunate girls, said that the Pope must be presented with a petition signed by them all in which they would ask His Holiness for permission to receive callers in the visiting room under the same honorable and decent conditions which were in force in all the establishments in which women were cloistered. The Cardinal told me to write the petition, get it signed, and bring it to the Princess; in the meanwhile, he said, he would find an opportunity to mention the matter to His Holiness and would think of someone to present the petition to him officially.

Not doubting that most of the recluses would sign, I composed the petition and, the second time I went to the grating with my friend, I left it with the girl, his sister's governess, with whom I had talked on the previous occasion. She assured me that I should have it back, signed by all the recluses, the first time I came to see her. The petition asked His Holiness only to abolish the excommunication affecting the visiting room where it was light enough to see; but I also briefly recounted the whole history of the house.

When the Princess of Santa Croce received the petition she went directly to the Protector, Cardinal Orsini,[67] who had to promise her that he would speak to the Pope, who, informed beforehand by Cardinal de Bernis, at once issued a papal brief abolishing the excommunication. The convent was first informed of it when someone was sent to remove the notice announcing it from the visiting-room door. The chaplain was instructed to inform the Superioress that in future she must permit all the girls who were asked for to receive callers in the light visiting room, though they must always be accompanied by their governesses. It was Marcuccio who brought me the news, which the Princess herself had not heard, and she was delighted to learn it from me. But Pope Ganganelli did not stop there. He ordered that the administration be put on trial at once and forced to account for all the money it had saved in the century and more which had elapsed since the house was founded. He reduced the number of recluses from one hundred to fifty, he set the dowry at four hundred scudi, and he ordered that every girl who had reached the age of twenty-five without having found a husband should be dismissed with the four hundred scudi which would have been given her if she had married, and that twelve mature women of good repute should be engaged at a salary as governesses of the girls in the house, each having four of them, and that twelve other serving women should be paid to do the housework.

CHAPTER II

Supper at an inn with Armellina and Emilia.

INTRODUCING ALL the innovations I have just explained took six months; what was done at once was to abolish the prohibition against entering the visiting room and even the convent itself, which, since the inmates were not cloistered, the Superioress was free to direct as she saw fit. Marcuccio had received the news in a note his sister had written him; he brought it to me joyously, begging me to go with him, as his sister requested, to please her governess. She told him also to ask at the grating for her young friend, who would come down either alone with her or with her own governess; it was I who was to ask for her. Delighted to fall in with this arrangement, I had Marcuccio leave his shop and take me to the convent, which was not far from San Paolo.[1] We asked for the two girls in the light visiting room, which we had no sooner entered than we saw the gratings occupied, one by the Abate Guasco,[2] whom I had known in Paris at Giulietta's[3] in 1751, the other by a Russian nobleman, Count Ivan Ivanovich Shuvalov,[4] and by Father Jacquier,[5] a Minimite friar of the Church of Trinità dei Monti, a famous astronomer. Inside I saw some very pretty girls.

All four of ours having come to the same grating, we began a most interesting conversation, but in whispers, because we could be overheard. We did not feel at our ease until the other visitors left. The object of my young friend's love was very pretty, but his sister was surprising. Fifteen or sixteen years of age, with a figure already voluptuously well developed, she cast a spell on me. I thought I had never seen a whiter complexion or such black eyes and eyebrows and hair; what gave her charms an irresistible power was the sweetness of her look and the ingenuous simplicity of her remarks. Her governess, who was ten or twelve years older than she, was also very likable, and very interesting by reason of a sadness which seemed to be the effect of a quantity of desires which she had to suppress. She amused me greatly by telling me all the particulars of the confusion which the abolition of the excommunication had brought about in the establishment. The Superioress was as pleased with it as the girls were; but the old bigots were scandalized. She told us that the Superioress had already ordered windows made to give light in the dark visiting rooms, even though the bigots insisted that she had no right to go beyond the permission the Father-Director had given her. The Superioress argued, and rightly, that as soon as everyone was allowed to enter the light visiting room the dark ones became ridiculous. She had also decided to have the double grating removed, since there was only a single one in the light visiting room. The Superioress's intelligence made me want to make her acquaintance, and Emilia arranged for me to have that pleasure the next day. Such was the name of Marcuccio's sister Armellina's sad friend. This first visit lasted two hours, which I found passing very quickly while Marcuccio availed himself of the opportunity to go and talk with his beloved at another grating, though she was still accompanied by her governess.

I left, after giving them ten Roman scudi, as I had done at my first visit, and kissing Armellina's hands, at which, though she made no attempt to deny them to me, she blushed scarlet. No man had ever touched her hands, and she was amazed when she saw the sensuous delight with which I covered them with kisses.

I went home in love with Armellina, surrendering to my budding passion, and not at all disheartened by the difficulties I foresaw I should encounter in obtaining her. But Marcuccio, more in love than ever, was in an ecstasy of bliss. He had made his declaration to his beloved, and she had replied that she asked nothing better than to become his wife as soon as he could obtain permission from the Cardinal-Protector. He was sure to obtain it if he could set up shop as a master tailor; he had finished his apprenticeship; he needed only a sum of money to furnish a small house, and the assurance of a sufficient number of customers. I promised him a hundred scudi as soon as he required them, and I congratulated him on his certainty of becoming happy, whereas I, in love with his sister and unable to marry her, was in despair.

"Then you are married?"

"Alas, yes! But you must say nothing, for I mean to go to see her every day, and if it were known that I am married my visits would become suspect."

It was not true, but it was what I had to say.

I was obliged to tell this lie, both to assure myself that I would never commit the folly of marrying and to keep Armellina from flattering herself that I was seeing her with no other intention. I found the Superioress polished, frank, reasonable, and not at all prejudiced. After the first time that she came down to the grating to please me, she sometimes came without being summoned; she knew that I was the prime mover in the happy reformation of the establishment, both the economy and the good order of which were under her direction, and she expressed all her obligation to me, which increased by leaps and bounds every day. In less than six weeks three of her girls had left, all to make good marriages, and she had been allowed an additional fifty scudi a month for the expenses of the house. She confided to me that she was not satisfied with the Dominican confessor, who, unlike the three others, made his penitents go to communion every Sunday and feast day, kept them in the confessional for hours, and condemned them to austerities and abstinences which made them ill and hence lose the time they needed to do their work. Having undertaken to see that her complaint was placed in the Cardinal's hands, I wrote it out for her, and she had the satisfaction of seeing no more of the Dominican and of distributing his penitents among the three other confessors, who were reasonable priests who did not dampen their devotion.

Marcuccio went alone on every feast day to see his fiancée. I went at nine o'clock almost every morning to see his sister with Emilia; I breakfasted with them, and I stayed with them until eleven o'clock in a visiting room in which there was only one grating, so that when I was there I fastened the door; however, it had another door giving access to the interior of the convent. Instead of a window being made, that door had been left open, admitting light enough; this was a great annoyance to me, for I constantly saw some of the recluses, both young and old, passing by the door, and, though they did not stop, they always glanced at the grating, which prevented Armellina from surrendering her hand to my amorous lips.

It was toward the end of December that, the weather having turned very chilly, I asked the Superioress to let me send her a screen, which alone could keep me from catching the cold which the draft from the door was sure to give me. The Superioress saw that, since she could not allow the door to be shut, she could not deny me the protection of the screen; so we were more at our ease, but within such narrow limits so far as the desires Armellina aroused in me were concerned that I could bear it no longer. For New Year's 1771 I gave each of the two girls a fine winter coat, and coffee and sugar to the Superioress, who was infinitely obliged to me. Emilia having often come to the grating half an hour before Armellina, who was not yet ready, so that I should not have to wait alone, Armellina too began often coming alone, waiting for Emilia, who, busy with something else, had not been able to come down with her. It was in the quarter hours of my being alone with her that Armellina's sweetness made me hopelessly in love with her.

Emilia was as fond of Armellina as Armellina was of her; but modesty in respect to everything to do with sensual pleasure was so strong in them that I had not yet succeeded in getting them to consent to listen to licentious talk or to pardon the freedoms which I wanted them to grant to my hands, and theirs too, to say nothing of letting my avid eyes look at what their education had taught them they must hide not only from the sight of all men but from themselves. They were astonished when I once asked them if, to exchange tokens of true friendship, they sometimes went to bed together. They blushed, and Emilia asked me what I could suppose friendship had in common with the discomfort of being two together in a very narrow bed. I took good care not to explain the reason for my question, for I saw that they were both frightened by the thought which must have led me to ask it; they were both made of flesh and blood, but I was convinced that they were sincere; they had never confided their secret mysteries to each other, and they had perhaps not even talked of them to their confessor, whether because of an unconquerable sense of shame or because it never occurred to them that they had sinned in what they might have let their hands do. I brought them white silk stockings lined with plush for winter, which they accepted with signs of the liveliest gratitude; but it was in vain that I asked them to put them on in my presence. It was no use my telling them that there was no essential difference between a girl's legs and a man's, that it could not even be a venial sin, that their confessor would consider them fools if they confessed it to him as a crime; they replied, always blushing and in concert, that it could not be permissible for girls, who, unlike men, had been given skirts for no other reason than to teach them that they must never raise them above the ground. I could have replied that skirts were made for nothing but to be turned up. The embarrassment with which Emilia advanced these arguments, which Armellina seconded, proved to me that it was neither artifice nor coquetry which made her speak as she did, but education and a sense of decency. I thought she believed that if she had done otherwise she would have lowered herself in my judgment and that I would have conceived a very unfavorable opinion of her. Yet she was twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age, and she was not prejudiced by any excessive devotion. As for Armellina, I saw that she felt ashamed to adhere to her duty less strictly than her friend; it seemed to me that she loved me and that, unlike what I had experienced with several other girls, I should find it easier to bring her to abandon some of her moral strictness in Emilia's absence than in her presence.

I made the experiment one morning when she appeared at the grating, telling me that Emilia would come down soon. I told her that, adoring her, I was the unhappiest of men, for, being married, I could not hope to marry her and thus gain the right to hold her in my arms and cover her all over with my kisses.

"Is it possible," I asked, "that I can live, with no other relief than kissing your beautiful hands?"

At these words, uttered with all the fire of passion, she looked at me steadily with her beautiful eyes and, after thinking for a moment, she began kissing my hand with the same eagerness which I showed when I kissed hers. I begged her to put her mouth to the grating; she blushed, she looked down, and she would not. I complained bitterly, but in vain. Armellina was deaf and dumb until the arrival of Emilia, who at once asked us why we were not gay as usual.

During these days, which were the first of the year 1771, I saw in my room Mariuccia, whom I had married ten years earlier to the worthy youth who had opened a wigmaker's shop. My reader may remember how I had made her acquaintance at the Abate Momolo's, scopatore[6] to Pope Rezzonico. All the inquiries I had made to learn something about Mariuccia during the three months I had been in Rome had been fruitless; I saw her before me with the greatest pleasure, the more so because I thought she had scarcely changed. She told me that she had seen me at St. Peter's at mass on Christmas Eve, and that, since she had not dared to approach me because of the company I was with, someone who was with her had undertaken to follow me and to send her word where I lived, and that, he having fulfilled his promise, she had come to see me. She told me that she had been in Frascati[7] for eight years, having a shop and living there very happily with her husband and her children, of which she had four, the eldest being a girl nine years of age. After asking Margherita to keep her company and making sure that she would dine with me, I went, as I did every day, to breakfast with Armellina, then I returned to Mariuccia, with whom I dined, and I spent the whole day delightfully without ever feeling tempted to renew the consequences of our old fondness with her. Our adventures were the subject of our talk, and the interesting news that my valet Costa had returned to Rome three years later with all the trappings of prosperity and had married Momolo's daughter, with whom he had fallen in love when he was in my service.

She said she had guessed that he had robbed me,[8] that he had left his wife two years after he married her, that no one knew where he was, and that she was in Rome in poverty, her father having died. I did not see fit to go to see her, for I could have done nothing but grieve her by telling her that I would have her husband hanged where-ever I found him. This remained my intention until the year 1785, when I found him in Vienna, valet to Count Hardegg.[9] When we come to it fourteen years hence, my reader will learn what I did. I promised Mariuccia that I would pay her a visit in Lent and bring presents to her children, especially her eldest daughter, who, according to Mariuccia, would interest me more than the others.

In love with Armellina, and unhappy, I inspired pity in the Princess of Santa Croce and Cardinal de Bernis, whom I often amused with a detailed account of all my sufferings. The Cardinal told the Princess that she could easily do me the favor of obtaining permission from Cardinal Orsini to take Armellina to the opera or the play and that, being of the party, I could make her less severe by my attentions. He said that she need have no doubt of the Cardinal's consent, since Armellina was neither a nun nor bound by any kind of vow, and that, since she must make her acquaintance before making her the offer, it could quickly be arranged.

"You have only to tell the Cardinal that you are curious to see the inside of the house."

"Will he give me permission?"

"Immediately, for they are cloistered only by the rules of the house. We will go with you."

"You will come too? A charming party!"

"Ask the Cardinal for permission, and we will set the hour afterward."

I thought I was dreaming when I heard this fine plan; I saw that the gallant Cardinal was curious to see the beautiful Armellina, and his curiosity did not alarm me, for I knew that he was not fickle. In addition, if Armellina pleased him, I was sure that both he and the Princess would use their influence to get her a suitable husband by procuring her a charitable stipend, of which there are many to be had in Rome.

Three or four days later the Princess summoned me to her box in the Teatro Aliberti,[10] and she showed me the Cardinal's written permission to visit the house with what company she chose to bring. She said that we would decide the day and hour after dinner the next day. The next morning the Superioress came to the grating to tell me that the Cardinal-Protector had sent her word that the Princess of Santa Croce would come to visit the house with a party, which gave her great pleasure. I told her that I knew it and that she would see me with the Princess. She wanted to know when, but I had no idea; I promised to inform her as soon as I knew. She said playfully that the news had set the whole house topsy-turvy, and turned the heads of all the prudes, for, except for some priests, the doctor, and the surgeon, no one since the house was founded had entered it simply to see it. I told her that there was no longer any question of excommunication, so she must put the idea of reclusion out of her mind, from which it followed that she could receive personal visitors herself without permission from the Cardinal. She replied with a smile that she would not dare.

After dinner we agreed on the hour for the next day, and I informed the Superioress in the morning. The Duchess of Fiano was one of the party, and we drove to the house, arriving there at three o'clock. The Cardinal wore nothing to show his exalted rank. He at once recognized Armellina from the description I had given him of her, and he talked to her of her charms and congratulated her on having made my acquaintance. Poor Armellina blushed again and again, and I thought she would faint when the Princess, after telling her that no one in the house was as pretty as she, gave her fond kisses. Poor Armellina was completely abashed, both because of the Princess's praise, which all the other girls heard, and because of her kisses, which were forbidden by the regulations anywhere in the house. After caressing the girl, the beautiful Princess began making herself agreeable to the Superioress; she said I had told her she was intelligent, and that she saw it in the order which she maintained throughout the big house; she promised to speak of her to the Cardinal, doing her all the justice she deserved. After seeing all the rooms and the refectories, she complimented Emilia, whom I presented to her. She told her that she knew she was sad, and that she would do her best to find her a husband who would know how to make her gay. The Superioress seconded the compliment with an approving smile; but I saw ten or twelve old bigots who raised their eyes to heaven. Emilia, however, at once kissed her hand, as if to beg her to keep her promise.

What filled me with satisfaction was that none of the inmates could bear away the prize from Armellina; not even my young friend Marcuccio's mistress could cast doubt on her superiority, for she was not tall. When we went down to the visiting room the Princess told Armellina that she would ask the Cardinal's permission to take her with her to three or four of the theaters in Rome during the Carnival, and at that I saw the whole community horror-stricken, except the Superioress, who said that His Eminence was free to end all severities in a house in which the girls were kept only in order to make good marriages. Armellina, blushing with shame and joy, was completely at a loss. She did not know where to find words to thank her. Just as we left, the Princess commended Armellina and Emilia to the Superioress's good graces, and gave her a note of hand so that she could make the two girls presents of what little things they most needed. The Duchess of Fiano told her that she would entrust me with a small present which she, too, wanted to give the two girls.

My reader can imagine all that I said to the Princess as soon as we were in the carriage to show her my feelings. Gratitude almost made me eat her up. Neither she nor the Cardinal had a moment's doubt of Armellina's intelligence, despite the fact that she had been too much taken aback to shine. She could be only what her education had made her. The Princess was impatient to see her at the theater with her, and at supper at an inn, as is the custom in Rome. She at once wrote the two girls' names on her tablets,[11] wanting to obtain all the charitable stipends possible for them. I thought of my poor Marcuccio's mistress, but it was not the moment to recommend her; it was to Cardinal de Bernis that I the next day confided my great interest in the young man, and, after seeing him, he took up his cause to such purpose that before the end of the Carnival he got him married to his fiancée with a dowry of five hundred scudi, which, with the hundred I let him have, gave him enough to furnish a house and set up shop.

But my moment of triumph came the next day after the visit to the grating, when the Superioress came down at once to thank me. The note of hand had been for fifty Roman scudi, with which she was going to provide both Armellina and Emilia with an ample supply of linen. They were astonished when I told them that the fat Abate was the Cardinal de Bernis, for they did not know that a Cardinal was ever permitted to doff the purple. The Duchess of Fiano had sent them a cask of wine; so much bounty led them to hope for more, and, since they considered me the sole cause of their good fortune, I thought I could aspire to everything.

Three or four days later the Princess thanked Cardinal Orsini, and, having told him that she was interested in arranging marriages for some of his girls and wanted first to give them a little knowledge of the world, she asked his permission to take them to the theater with her sometimes, promising to see that they should always return to their house properly accompanied. The Cardinal had replied that the Superioress would receive whatever instructions she might wish in the matter. I told the Princess that I should be able to tell her what orders the Superioress received.

The Superioress herself told me the next day that the Cardinal's auditor had come to tell her that His Eminence left the care of the girls in her house entirely to her discretion and to order her to show the Princess of Santa Croce every consideration, letting her take them out, either coming for them herself or sending trustworthy people whom she knew. She had also been ordered to send him the names of those who, having passed the age of thirty, wanted to leave the place, receiving two hundred scudi. She had not yet made this last order public, but she was certain that she would get rid of at least twenty in this way.

As soon as I informed the Princess of what the Superioress had been ordered to do, she declared that the Cardinal could not have acted more generously. Cardinal de Bernis told her that the first time she wanted to take the girls to a play or the opera she should go to fetch them in person and tell the Superioress that she would never send for them except by sending one of her own carriages with her livery. She acted accordingly, and a few days later she went by herself for Armellina and Emilia and took them to her palace[12] on the Campo di Fiore, where I was waiting for her with the Cardinal, her husband the Prince, and the Duchess of Fiano.

They were made much of, questioned kindly, encouraged to answer, to laugh, to express themselves freely; but it was no use; finding themselves for the first time in a splendid room, and in such company, they did not have the strength to speak, they were overwhelmed with shame and with fear of saying something stupid. Emilia did not dare to answer without rising, and Armellina shone only by her beauty; urged by the Princess to return her kisses of the sort she was giving her, she could never bring herself to do it. Armellina smilingly excused herself, kissed her hand ecstatically, and, when the Princess pressed her lips to hers, Armellina seemed to have no idea of how to give a kiss. The Cardinal and the Prince laughed, the Duchess of Fiano said that so much reserve was unnatural, and I suffered the torments of the damned, for such awkwardness seemed to me to verge on stupidity, for Armellina had only to kiss the Princess's lips as she was kissing her hands. She thought that to kiss her so would be to fail in respect to her, and that she had no right to take such a liberty despite the Princess's permission.

The Cardinal said to me privately that he thought it impossible that in the course of two months I had not initiated the girl; but he had to believe it and recognize the power of education. For this first time the Princess wanted to take them to the comedy at the Tor di nona,[13] where they were sure to laugh, and that made us hope. After the play we went to sup at an inn, and at table, whether because they were hungry or because of my remonstrances, they unbent a little. They let themselves be persuaded to drink wine, and that gave them courage. Emilia shook off her sadness, and Armellina at last gave the beautiful Princess some proper kisses and, when she rose from the table, scores of them, and the acclamations of the company convinced her that she had done nothing wrong.

It was to me that the Princess entrusted the delightful task of escorting them back to the convent. The moment had come for me to take the first step toward the goal which every lover sets himself. The carriage was of the kind which has a seat for two and a folding seat; but scarcely had it set off before I saw that one must never reckon without one's host. When I tried to bestow kisses a head was turned away, when I tried to extend my hands a dress was drawn tight, when I tried to use force I was repulsed, when I complained I was even told that I was in the wrong, when I grew angry I received no reply, and when I threatened never to show my face again I was not believed.

As soon as we arrived at the convent, a maid opened the small door, and, seeing that she did not shut it after the girls had gone in, I went in too, and, seeing that I was not stopped, I went up to the fourth floor with them to the Superioress's room, finding her in bed but apparently not surprised to see me. I told her that I considered it my duty to deliver her young charges to her in person; she thanked me; she asked them if they had had an amusing evening and a good supper, after which she asked me to make as little noise as I could going down the stairs. So I wished them a good night's sleep, and I left, giving the maid a zecchino, and the coachman another when I got out at my inn. I found Margherita asleep in an armchair; she woke and began calling me names, but she changed her tone when my fond caresses gave her reason to conclude that I had not been guilty of any infidelity. I sent her away two hours later after thoroughly convincing her that I loved her alone. I slept until noon and, after dining with her, at three o'clock I went to the Princess's, where I found the Cardinal. They were expecting me to narrate a triumph, and they were surprised to hear the opposite, and especially to find me unperturbed.

I may have appeared to be so, but I was far from being so in reality. It was simply that, having outgrown childishness, I gave a comic turn to my bad luck, ending by saying that, since I had no love for Pamelas,[14] I had decided to abandon the enterprise. The Cardinal said that he would congratulate me on it in three days.

Not seeing me that day, Armellina thought that I had slept late; but when she did not see me on the day after that she sent to her brother to ask if I was ill, for I had never gone two days without seeing her. So Marcuccio, come to tell me that his sister was anxious, was of course delighted that he could go back to tell her that I was in good health.

"Yes, my dear friend, go and tell her that I will continue to ask the Princess's good graces for her, but that she will see no more of me."

"But why?"

"Because I mean to try to get over my unhappy passion. Your sister does not love me, I am only too sure of it. I am no longer young, and I do not feel inclined to become a martyr to virtue. However virtuous a girl may be, love does not permit her to carry virtue so far. She has never granted me even the trifling favor of a kiss."

"I'd never have believed it."

"Believe it. I must end the thing. Your sister is too young, and she does not know what risks she runs by acting as she does toward a man in love at my age. Tell her all that, and refrain from giving her any advice."

"You cannot imagine how this grieves me. Perhaps Emilia's presence embarrasses her."

"No, for I have often urged her when we were alone. In short, I must get over it; if she does not love me, I will not have her yield either to seduction or to gratitude. The practice of virtue costs no effort at all to a girl who is not in love; she may feel that she is ungrateful, but she takes pleasure in sacrificing gratitude to prejudice. How does your fiancée treat you?"

"Very well, ever since she has been sure that I will marry her."

Hearing this, I was sorry that I had begun by saying that I was married, for, in the state to which I had been brought, I would have given her a promise of marriage, without any intention of deceiving her. Marcuccio went away troubled, and I went to the meeting of the Arcadians[15] at the Capitol, where the Marquise d'Aout[16] was to recite her diploma poem upon becoming a member. She was a young Frenchwoman who had been in Rome for six months with a husband as pleasant and likable as herself but very much below her in intelligence. The Marquise even possessed genius; on that day I began an intimate friendship with her, but with no thought of love; I left the coast clear for a French Abbé who was madly in love with her and who gave up his fortune for her.

The Princess of Santa Croce told me every day that she would give me the key to her box whenever I wanted to take the two girls to the opera, even without her; but when she saw that a week had passed without my returning there she began to believe that I had broken off completely. The Cardinal thought I was still in love, and he praised my behavior; he predicted that the Superioress would write to me, and he guessed rightly. At the end of a week she wrote me a short, polite note in which she asked me to come to the visiting room and send for her. I thought I could not avoid going.

Since I asked for her alone, she came down alone at ten o'clock in the morning. She began by asking me why I had so suddenly stopped my visits.

"Because I love Armellina."

"That was the reason which led you to honor her with a visit every day; it is hard to understand how one and the same reason can have an entirely opposite consequence."

"It cannot but have it, Signora; for when one is in love one desires, and when one desires vainly one suffers, and constant suffering makes men unhappy; so you see that I must do everything in my power to cease to be so."

"I am sorry for you, and I see that you are acting wisely; but if matters are as I think them to be, permit me to tell you that you must esteem Armellina and so you must not, by abandoning her, lead all the girls in this house to conclude what is not the truth."

"And what can they conclude?"

"That your feeling was only a whim, and that you left her as soon as you had satisfied it."

"That would be the height of malice; but I do not know what to do about it, for I have no other way to cure myself of my folly. Do you know any other? Be so good as to tell me it."

"I do not know very much about that disease; but it seems to me that little by little love becomes friendship, and then one is at peace."

"That is true; but to become friendship love must not be handled roughly. If the loved object does not treat it tenderly, it becomes contempt or indifference. I do not want either to become desperate myself or to condemn Armellina, who is an angel of beauty and virtue. I want to continue to be useful to her, and not to see her, and I am sure that cannot be displeasing to her, for she must have been aware of my anger. It must not happen again."

"To tell you the truth, I am completely in the dark. They have always assured me that they did not fail in their duty toward you and that they cannot possibly divine the reason which may have induced you to stop coming to see them."

"Whether from shyness, or prudence, or fear of wronging me, they have lied to you; but you deserve to know all. My honor itself demands that I inform you."

"Please do so, and you can be sure of my discretion."

I then told her the whole story in detail, and I saw that she was greatly moved. She said that her principle was never to think evil unless the likelihood of it was very strong, but that, knowing human weakness, she would never have believed that we would have kept ourselves under such severe restraint for almost three months during which we saw each other every day.

"I think," she said, "that there is less harm in a kiss than in the scandal your abandoning her is causing."

"But I am sure that Armellina does not care at all."

"She cries every morning."

"Her tears may spring from vanity, or perhaps from the reason which people give for my inconstancy."

"No, for I have had everyone in the house told that you are ill."

"And what does Emilia say?"

"She does not cry, but she is very sad, and I think that by constantly saying that if you do not come any more it is not her fault she means that it is Armellina's. Do me the favor to come tomorrow; they are dying to go at least once to the opera at the Aliberti and to the opera buffa at the Capranica." [17]

"Very well, Signora, I will come to breakfast tomorrow, and tomorrow evening they shall see the opera."

"I am delighted and I thank you. May I tell them the news?"

"I even beg you, Signora, to tell Armellina that I have decided to come to see her again only because what you have said has persuaded me."

How glad the Princess was when I told her the news that afternoon! The Cardinal knew that the thing was bound to turn out as it was doing. She at once gave me the ticket for her box for the next day, and ordered her stableman to put her carriage and liveried servants at my disposition.

The next day when I sent for Armellina Emilia came down first in order to have time to reproach me for my behavior; she said that a man could not act as I had done if he was really in love, and that I had done wrong to tell the Superioress everything.

"I should have told her nothing if I had had anything of consequence to tell her."

"Armellina has become unhappy since she has known you."

"Why, may I ask?"

"Because she does not want to fail in her duty, and she sees that you love her only to turn her from it."

"But her unhappiness will end as soon as I cease to urge her."

"And at the same time cease to see her."

"Exactly. Do you think it does not cost me pain? But my peace of mind demands the effort."

"Then she will be convinced that you did not love her."

"She may think as she pleases. Meanwhile, what I know is that, if she loved me as I love her, we should be of one mind."

"We have duties which you men consider that you do not have."

"Then be faithful to your pretended duties, and do not blame a man of honor for respecting them by avoiding your company."

Armellina appeared, and I found her changed.

"You do not look yourself, you are pale and downcast. Why?"

"Because you have hurt me."

"Then calm yourself, be cheerful again, and let me try to cure myself of a passion which by its very nature tries to turn you from your duty. I will be your friend despite everything, and I will come to see you once a week as long as I remain in Rome."

"Once a week! You shouldn't have begun by coming every day."

"That is true. Your face deceived me into thinking what is not so; but I hope that, at least from gratitude, you will permit me to become reasonable again. To help the remedy to take effect, I must see you as seldom as possible. Consider it a little, and you will conclude that the course on which I have embarked is wise, virtuous, and worthy of your esteem."

"It is a pity that you cannot love me as I love you."

"That is to say calmly. Without desiring anything."

"I don't say that—but practicing the art of checking desires which are contrary to our duty."

"That is an art which at my age I should not want to learn. Will you be so good as to tell me if you suffer very much from suppressing the desires which your love for me arouses in you?"

"I should be very sorry to suppress my desires every time I think of you. On the contrary, I cultivate them, I foster them. I wish you would be made Pope, I sometimes wish you were my father so that I could give you countless caresses in perfect freedom, in my dreams I wish you could become a girl as I am, so that I could live with you every hour of the day."

At that I could not keep from laughing.[18] After telling them that I would come to take them to the Teatro Aliberti, I left them with the joy which a man in love must feel when he is certain that he will succeed, even though with great difficulty, for in all that Armellina had just said to me I found not the least trace of artifice or coquetry. She loved me and she persisted in not admitting it to herself, and consequently she was reluctant to grant me pleasures in which her nature would have forced her to share, whereupon she would have become convinced that she loved me. She reasoned thus unconsciously. Experience had not taught her that she must either flee me or prepare to fall a victim to love.

At the hour for the opera I went to fetch them in the same carriage and with the same footman. When the portress saw the Santa Croce livery, she had them come down, and they found me sitting on the folding seat. They were not surprised to find me alone. Emilia brought me compliments from the Superioress, who asked me to come to speak with her the next day. I took them to the opera, where I never interrupted the attention they should give to a spectacle they were seeing for the first time. Neither gay nor sad, I undertook nothing except to answer all their questions. As Romans, they must have been more or less acquainted with the physical characteristics of castrati; nevertheless, Armellina insisted that the one who was singing the second role was a woman: his bosom proved it to her. I asked her if she would dare to go to bed with him, and she answered that she would not, because a decent girl must always be in bed alone.

So strictly had the girls in the house been brought up. This silence and mystery about everything which could stimulate the pleasure of love could only have led them to attach the greatest importance to everything concerning the senses of sight and touch; that was why Armellina would only surrender her hands to me after defending them for a long time, and would never let me see if the stockings I had given her were a good fit. The prohibition against sleeping with another girl must have made her consider that letting herself be seen naked was a dreadful sin, and if it was a sin with a girl like herself, what could she not but think if it were ever a case of her being with a man? The mere idea must make her shudder. Every time that, seeing them at the grating, I had allowed myself a certain freedom in referring to the pleasures of love, I had found them deaf and dumb. I was furious. I felt no wish to lighten Emilia's gloom, though she was fresh and rather pretty; but I was in despair when I saw Armellina's face lose all its cheerfulness when I asked her if she knew in what the difference between a girl and a man consisted.

After the opera Armellina told me she had a good appetite after a week during which she had eaten next to nothing because of her grief at seeing no more of me. I replied that if I had known it I would have ordered a good supper, whereas we should eat only what the innkeeper had to give us.

"How many shall we be?"

"Just the three of us."

"So much the better. We shall be more at liberty."

"Then you don't like the Princess?"

"I like her, but she wants me to give her kisses which amaze me."

"But you gave her some, and very loving ones."

"I was afraid that if I didn't she would think me a fool."

"Will you be so good as to tell me if you think you sinned by giving her those kisses?"

"Certainly not, for I took no pleasure in them."

"Then why haven't you made the same effort for me?"

She did not answer, and we arrived at the inn, where I had a good fire made and ordered a good supper. The waiter asked me if I wanted oysters and, seeing that the girls were curious to find out what they were, I asked him the price of them. He said that they came from the Arsenal [19] at Venice, and that he could not sell them for less than fifty paoli a hundred, and I assented. I insisted on their being opened in my presence.

Armellina, astonished that her whim was going to cost me five Roman scudi, asked me to countermand the order; but she said no more when I told her that nothing seemed expensive to me when I saw that it enabled me to give her a pleasure. At my reply she took my hand, which I angrily withdrew when she raised it to her lips; but, having done it a little too roughly, I saw that Armellina was hurt. I was seated in front of the fire between her and Emilia; her dismay pained me; I begged her pardon, saying that my hand was not worthy of her kisses; but despite my excuse Armellina could not prevent two small tears from welling from her beautiful eyes. It made me very sad. Armellina was too much the dove to be treated harshly. I could renounce her love, but, if I was not to make her either fear me or hate me, which I did not want, I must either stop seeing her at all or completely change my approach. Made certain by the two tears that I must have wounded her delicacy to the utmost, I rose and went downstairs to order champagne.

Coming up again five or six minutes later, I saw that she had really cried and that she would come to supper in no frame of mind to enjoy it, and it distressed me. I had no time to lose. I repeated my excuses, and I begged her to resume her smiling countenance unless she wanted to mortify me extremely. Emilia backed me up, I took her hand, I kissed it tenderly, and she cheered up. The hundred oysters were brought and opened, filling four large dishes. The poor girls' astonishment would greatly have amused me if I had had reason to be happy; but I was desperate with love. I pined, and Armellina begged me to be as I had been when I first knew her—as if one's state of mind depended on one's will.

We sat down at table, where I taught the two girls to eat oysters by setting them the example. They were swimming in their liquid. Armellina, after swallowing five or six of them, said to Emilia that anything so delicious must be a sin; Emilia replied that it would not be a sin because the taste was exquisite but because with each oyster we swallowed we swallowed half a paoli.

"Half a paoli?" said Armellina. "And Our Lord the Pope does not forbid it? If it isn't a sin of gluttony, I'd like to know what gluttony means. I eat these oysters with pleasure; but I assure you that I will accuse myself of it in confession to see what my confessor will say."

This simplicity rejoiced my soul; but it was in my body that I needed to rejoice. My love which was dying of starvation envied the luck of my mouth. In the course of eating fifty oysters we emptied two bottles of sparkling champagne, which aroused laughter in the two girls who had to commit the indecency of belching. How I regretted that I could not laugh my fill, and devour Armellina with kisses instead of only with my eyes! I told the waiter to serve the supper, keeping the rest of the oysters for dessert. They were surprised to find their appetites keener after eating sixteen such excellent tidbits. Armellina seemed to me to have become amorous; I needed to believe it and to hope. Counting somewhat on Bacchus, I forbade water. We had a supper of the first quality for an inn. My poor heroines let themselves go. Even Emilia was on fire. I ordered up lemons, a bottle of rum, sugar, a big bowl, and hot water, and, after having the other fifty oysters put on the table, I dismissed the waiter. I made a large quantity of punch, which I enlivened by pouring a bottle of champagne into it. After we each swallowed five or six oysters and drank some punch, at which the two girls exclaimed, for they were carried away by so charming a beverage, I took it into my head to ask Emilia to put an oyster into my mouth with her own lips.

"You are too intelligent," I said, "to suppose that there is any harm in it."

Astonished at my proposal, Emilia sank into thought. Armellina watched her attentively, curious to hear what answer she would give me.

"Why," she asked, "don't you propose it to your Armellina?"

"Give him one first," Armellina said to her, "and if you have the courage I will have it too."

"What courage does it take? It's a child's game, there's no harm in it."

After receiving this propitious answer, I thought I could count on victory. I put the shell to her mouth, I told her to suck in the liquid and keep the oyster between her lips. She performed the feat to the letter after laughing heartily, and I took the oyster by pressing my lips to hers with the greatest decency. Armellina applauded her, saying that she had not thought she had it in her to do it, and she imitated her to perfection. She was delighted by the delicacy with which I took the oyster from her lips. She astonished me by saying that it was my turn to pay them back for their gifts, and God knows how much I enjoyed fulfilling the duty.

Playing this pretty game, we ate all the oysters, meanwhile emptying glass after glass of punch. We were sitting in a row with our backs to the fire, I in the middle, our heads were whirling, never was intoxication either gayer or more justified or more complete. But the punch was not finished. We felt the heat. Unable to bear it any longer, I took off my coat, and they had to unlace their dresses, which were lined in front with fur. I told them that there was a water closet near the door of our room to which they could go, and they quickly rose and took hands, delighted that I had guessed their need, which they dared not impart to me. They came back bursting with laughter, for they could not stand straight. I left them for a moment for the same reason, but a little less drunk than they. They were sitting by the fire, doing nothing but laugh at the condition they were in. I served as their fire screen, telling them nothing of the pleasure I took in seeing them in a state of disorder, which, allowing me to gaze at the beauty of their bosoms, enchanted my soul. I thanked them both for the pleasure they gave me by their charming company. I told them we must not leave the inn until we had drunk all the punch. They replied, with shrieks of laughter, that it would be a shame to leave it, and we drank. I made bold to tell them that their legs were so pretty that I could not say which pair deserved the preference, and at that their laughter redoubled, because they had not noticed that their open skirts and short petticoats let me see half of their legs.

After finishing the punch we stayed for another half an hour, talking aimlessly, while I silently congratulated myself on having the firmness not to undertake anything. Just as we left I asked them if they had any cause to complain of me, and Armellina was the first to say that if I wanted her as my soul's daughter she was ready to follow me everywhere.

"Then you no longer fear that I will urge you to fail in your duty?"

"No, I believe I am safe with you."

"And you?" I asked Emilia.

"As for me, I will love you when you do for me what the Superioress will tell you tomorrow."

"I will do everything, but I shall not go to see her until toward evening, for it is now three o'clock."

It was then that they laughed. "What will our mother say, what will our mother say?" I quickly paid for everything on the reckoning, rewarding the waiter generously, and I took them back to their convent, where the portress was very well pleased with the new order of the establishment when she received two zecchini. It being far too late to go upstairs, I at once went home, whence I sent back the Princess's carriage, to the great satisfaction of the coachman and the footman. But the one who was satisfied was Margherita, who would have scratched my eyes out if I had not repeatedly convinced her of my perfect fidelity. I told her, and she had to believe me, that I had been detained playing cards until that hour.

The next day I amused the Princess and the Cardinal with a detailed account of all that I had done. The Princess said that I had missed the moment, but the Cardinal declared that I had laid the foundation for a complete victory another day.

I went to the convent to learn what the Superioress wanted and what I could do for Emilia. The kindly Superioress received me by congratulating me on my having been able to amuse myself in the company of her two charges until three o'clock in the morning without having done anything with them which was not perfectly decent. They had told her how we had eaten fifty oysters, and she declared it a most innocent game. After this preamble, she told me that I could make Emilia happy by persuading the Princess to procure her a dispensation from publishing the banns of her marriage to a merchant who lived in Civitavecchia, and who would long since have married her but for the need to publish the banns, for there was a woman who claimed that he was under an obligation to marry her, though she had no legitimate reason for it. Her opposition would give rise to a suit which would never end.

"Emilia," she said, "would be made happy, and she would owe it entirely to you."

I took the man's name, I promised her I would use my best eloquence on the Princess. She asked me if I was still firm in my resolve to try to cure myself of my love for Armellina, and I said that I was, but that I would not begin to stop seeing her until Lent. She congratulated me on the Carnival being a very long one that year.

The next day I spoke to the Princess about the dispensation from publishing the banns, which of course was not to be asked for without a certificate from the Bishop of Civitavecchia[20] that the man was free. The Cardinal told me to have the man come to Rome, and he would see to the matter, provided he could have two reputable witnesses testify that he was not married. The Superioress wrote to him accordingly, and a few days later I saw the man in another visiting room at a grating with the Superioress and Emilia. Earnestly begging for my good offices, he said that before he could marry he must be sure of having six hundred scudi. He needed to obtain a charitable stipend of two hundred scudi, for the convent gave him four hundred; and I succeeded; but before that I arranged to have a very different supper with Armellina, who every morning at her grating asked me when I would take her to the opera buffa which was being given at the Teatro Capranica. I replied that I feared my love would force me to infringe on duties which she cherished more than she did opera buffa. They said that experience had taught them they need not fear me. Armellina said with a smile that her confessor had laughed at her when she had told him that she had eaten oysters by taking them from a man's lips with hers. He had told her that it was no more than a piece of nastiness.

CHAPTER III

The Florentine. Emilia married. Scholastica. Armellina at the ball.

IF BEFORE supping with Armellina I was in love with her to the point of being forced not to see her again if she was not to drive me mad, after the supper I found myself absolutely obliged to obtain her if I was not to die. Having seen that she had consented to the small liberties to which I had urged her only by taking them as inconsequential trifling, I decided to pursue my object as far as possible by the same means. I began playing the role of indifference to the best of my ability; I went there only every other day, I did not give her amorous looks, I pretended to forget to kiss her hand, I did the same with Emilia, I talked to her of her engagement, and I told her that if I were sure of obtaining some favor from her I would go to stay in Civitavecchia for a few days after her marriage was celebrated. I made believe I did not notice that this talk hurt Armellina, who could not bear my showing a desire for her friend. Emilia answered me that, once she was married, she would feel less strictly bound by her duties, and Armellina, annoyed that she made bold to let me hope for some favors in her presence, told her that a married woman's duties were more binding than those of a spinster. I reproved her by alleging a false doctrine. I said that a wife's great duty was only not to risk making her husband's progeny illegitimate, that anything else was a trifle, and that I would never demand anything of Emilia but trifles to amuse hands and eyes. I even told Emilia that if I was to act to good purpose in obtaining charitable stipends for her she must not only make me hope that she would be kind when I was in Civitavecchia but must give me some pledge of her future kindness before she was married. On one such occasion she answered that she would give me no pledges except those which Armellina would give me, and that I should think of getting her married too. Despite the troubled state into which this conversation put her, Armellina told me that I was the only man she could say she had seen since the day she was born, and that, not hoping to be married, she would never give me any pledge, though she could not imagine what such a pledge could be. I had the strength to go, leaving her troubled. It was killing me to have to play this role toward an angel whom I adored; but I knew no surer way of overcoming her prejudices.

I engaged a box at the Capranica when I saw some magnificent oysters which were delivered to the Venetian Ambassador's major-domo, who let me have a hundred of them for what they had cost him. Taking them to the inn at which I had supped the first time, I asked the waiter for a room in which there was a bed; but he replied that it was not permitted in Rome; he said that on the fourth floor I could have two rooms in which there were long sofas, which I was free to consider beds, and, finding that it was so, I engaged them. I told him to light fires in both rooms and to serve me with the most delicate fare in Rome.

Entering the third-tier box I had taken with the two girls, in the box next to mine I saw the Marquise d'Aout, and I did not have time to escape her. She at once greeted me, congratulating herself on being my neighbor. She was with her French Abbé, her husband, and a young man as handsome as he was well-mannered, whom I had never seen at her house. She at once asked me who the two girls she saw with me were, and I said that they belonged to the household of the Venetian Ambassador. She praised their beauty, without making any invidious distinction between them; but she began talking a great deal to Armellina, who was on her side and who replied very prettily to all the remarks she addressed to her until the performance began. The young man also began speaking to her, and, after asking my permission, he gave her a large paper of sweetmeats, asking her to share it with her neighbor. Having learned from his accent that he was a Florentine, I asked him if the sweets were from his country, and he replied that they were from Naples, whence he had arrived three days earlier.

After the first act I was surprised to hear him tell me that he had a letter which the Marchesa della C. . .[1] had charged him to deliver to me.

"I have just learned your name," he said, "and I shall have the honor to bring it to you tomorrow, if you will be so good as to tell me where you are staying."

After the usual exchange of politenesses, I feel obliged to tell him. I ask him for news of the Marchese, of his mother-in-law, of Anastasia, saying that I am delighted to receive letters from the Marchesa, from whom I had been awaiting an answer for six months.

"It is precisely the answer to your letter with which that charming lady has charged me."

"I cannot wait to read it."

"I can give it to you now, without prejudice to the pleasure I shall have in seeing you at your lodging tomorrow. I will bring it to you in your box, if I may."

"Pray do so."

He could have handed it to me directly from where he sat, but what of that?

He comes in, I yield him my place next to Armellina, he takes a portfolio from his pocket and gives me the letter. I open it, I see that it is four pages long, I tell him I will read it at home because the box is dark, and I put it in my pocket. He tells me that he intends to stay in Rome until after Easter, since he wants to see everything, though he could not hope to see anything more beautiful than what was before his eyes.

Armellina, who was looking at him very attentively, blushes and turns away her head; as for me, I am annoyed and feel in a manner insulted by his compliment, which was polite, but as insolent as it was unexpected. I make no reply, and I decide that the handsome young man must be a fool and a fop of the first water. Seeing that we have fallen silent, he realizes that he has offended me; and after some disconnected remarks he leaves.

I at once congratulate Armellina on the fine conquest she has made in half an hour, and I ask her what she thinks of the man she has so thoroughly enchanted.

"He seems to me very handsome, but I thought the compliment he paid me showed deplorably bad taste.[2] Please tell me if it is the fashion to make a girl one sees for the first time blush like that."

"No, my dear Armellina, it is neither the fashion nor polite nor behavior permissible to anyone who wants to frequent good society and who has had any experience of the world."

Sunk in silence, I appeared to be doing nothing but listen to the beautiful music, but the truth was that the worm of base jealousy was gnawing at my heart. I examined the feeling of resentment which was upsetting me, and I exerted my mind to find it well founded, for it seemed to me that the Florentine must have supposed me to be in love with Armellina and should not have begun by making the most well-turned of declarations of love to her in my presence without fear of displeasing me, unless he took me for a man who would be in the company of such a pretty girl only as her lap dog. At the end of half an hour of this silence, the ingenuous and sincere Armellina put me in an even worse state by saying with a fond look that I ought to calm myself and be sure that the young man had not given her the slightest pleasure by his flattery. She did not understand that it was to tell me exactly the opposite. I replied that, on the contrary, I wished that he had pleased her. The dear child continued to torment me by saying that he had probably thought I was her father.

What reply could I make to an argument as cruel as it was plausible? None. I could only fume, remain silent, and finally, unable to bear more, ask Armellina and Emilia to leave with me. It was at the end of the second act, and certainly if I had had my wits about me I should never have made the sweet girls a proposal all the tyranny and injustice of which I did not see until the next day. Nevertheless, they looked at each other for a moment, then they were ready. I told them by way of excuse that I had to make sure that the Santa Croce carriage was not recognized, as it would be if we left the theater with the crowd, and that we would go there again on the next day but one. I prevented Armellina from leaning out of the box to greet the Marquise d'Aout. At the door I found the lackey who was serving me talking with one of his fellows, which led me to conclude that the Princess was at the opera. We got out at the inn. I whispered to the lackey to return to the palace and to come back at three o'clock in the morning. The weather was cold, so I had to consider the horses.

We at once sat down in front of the fire, where for half an hour I gave no thought to anything but the excellent oysters, which a deft scullion opened in our presence, taking great care not to lose a single drop of the savory liquid in which they were swimming. We ate them as they were opened, and the laughter of the girls, who were thinking of the game of exchanging them, began to dissipate my ill-humor. In Armellina's sweet gentleness, I thought I saw the innocence of her beautiful soul, and I was angry with myself because, envious of the justice a man more fit to please her than I had done to her charms, I had permitted a hateful feeling to trouble my peace of mind. Armellina, drinking champagne as I had taught her to do, looked at me as if she were begging me to add my gaiety to hers. Emilia talked to me about her future marriage; and, without saying again that I would go to Civitavecchia, I promised her that her fiancé would have the dispensations in a few days, at the same time kissing Armellina's beautiful hands again and again, while she seemed grateful to me for being loving once more.

Put in high spirits by the oysters and the champagne, we supped deliciously. We had sturgeon and exquisite truffles, whose delicacy I savored more by enjoying the voluptuous appetite with which the girls were eating them than by eating myself. A natural and well-founded feeling informs the thinking man that a sure way to make a woman love him is to procure her some new pleasure. When Armellina saw me filled with joy and once again ardent, she could not but recognize her handiwork and delight in the power she had over me. She gave me her hand of her own free will. She kept me from turning my head to the left to look at Emilia, constantly keeping her eyes on mine. Emilia ate and did not care. It seemed to me impossible that Armellina could refuse herself to my love after supper, when we came to the orgy of oysters and punch.

After serving the dessert, the remaining fifty oysters, and bringing me everything I needed to make punch, the waiter left, saying that the water was on the fire in the other room, where there was everything necessary for the young ladies to retire. The room being small, we were too hot; I urged them to go into the other room and get rid of their fur-lined dresses, and come back to eat oysters in perfect freedom. Their dresses were fitted to their figures with whalebone stays, they returned in white corsets and short dimity petticoats which came only halfway down their calves. They returned with their arms around each other, laughing over their state of undress. I had the strength to conceal all the emotion which this enchanting costume aroused in me, and even to refrain from fixing my eyes on their bosoms while they were complaining that they had neither fichus around their necks nor jabots at the top of their shifts. I said nonchalantly that I would not look at them, for the sight of a bosom left me perfectly indifferent. Knowing nature, I had to lie. I was sure that they could no longer set much value on what I valued so little.[3] The two girls, who knew that they had very beautiful bosoms, were astonished by my disdain; they had to suppose that I had never seen beautiful bosoms; and the truth is that in Rome beautiful breasts are scarcer than pretty faces. Despite their good morals, Armellina and Emilia could not but undertake to convince me that I was wrong; it was my part to put them at their ease and in a frame of mind to feel ashamed of nothing. I delighted them by saying that I wanted to see them make the punch themselves. The lemon juice had already been squeezed into a big goblet. They were charmed when I told them that I found the punch better than the one I had made the first time they drank it.

At the game of passing oysters from mouth to mouth I chided Armellina for swallowing the liquid before I took the oyster. I admitted that it was difficult to do otherwise, but I undertook to show them how to go about keeping both the oyster and the liquid in their mouths by raising a rampart behind it with the tongue to stop it from entering the throat. Having to set them the example, I taught each of them to insert the oyster and the liquid into the other's mouth as I did by simultaneously inserting the full length of the tongue. I did not object when they took no offense at my extending mine, nor did Armellina object when I lingered over sucking hers, which she gave me most generously, laughing heartily afterward at the pleasure afforded by the game, than which they agreed with me nothing could be more innocent.

It was by chance that a fine oyster which I gave Emilia, putting the shell to her lips, dropped into her bosom; she made to recover it; but I claimed that it was mine by right, and she had to yield, let me unlace her, and gather it with my lips from the depth to which it had dropped. In the course of this she had to bear with my uncovering her bosom completely; but I retrieved the oyster in such a way that there was no sign of my having felt any pleasure except that of having recovered, chewed, and swallowed it. Armellina watched the whole procedure without smiling, surprised that I appeared to show no interest in what I must have seen. Four or five oysters later I gave one to Armellina, who was sitting on my lap, and I cleverly dropped it into her bosom, which brought a laugh from Emilia, who at bottom was annoyed that Armellina had escaped a test of an intrepidity such as she had shown me. But I saw that Armellina was delighted by the mishap, though she refused to give any sign of it.

"I want my oyster," I said.

"Take it."

I unlace her whole bodice, and, the oyster having dropped as far down as possible, I complain that I shall have to bring it up with my hand. Good God! What torment for a man in love to have to hide the excess of his delight at such a moment! Armellina had not the slightest pretext to accuse me of anything, for I did not touch her beautiful breasts, hard as marble, except in searching for the oyster. After retrieving and swallowing it, I took hold of one of her breasts, demanding the liquid from the oyster which had spilled on it; I seized the rosebud with my avid lips, surrendering to all the voluptuous feelings inspired in me by the imaginary milk which I sucked for a good two or three minutes. I saw that she was surprised and moved; but when I let her go, it was only to recover my soul, which my great pleasure had made to exhale where I did not know if she could suspect it. But when she saw me fix my eyes on hers as if in a stupor, she asked me if I had very much enjoyed imitating the babe at the breast.

"Yes, for it is an innocent game."

"I do not believe so, and I hope you will say nothing about it to our Superioress; what you did is not innocent for me, and we must retrieve no more oysters."

Emilia said that such little weaknesses were wiped out with holy water.

"We can swear," she added, "that we have not given one another a single kiss."

They went into the next room for a moment, and, after I went there myself, we moved the table away and sat down by the fire on a sofa which we pulled up to it, with a stand on which were the bowl of punch and glasses beside us. We had no more oysters

Sitting between them, I spoke of our legs, which were exactly alike yet which women insisted on concealing under their skirts, and, so saying, I touched their legs, adding that it was just as if I were touching my own, and seeing that they had not opposed my examining them up to the knee, I told Emilia that I wanted no reward from her but her permission to judge the thickness of her thighs in comparison with Armellina's.

"Hers," said Armellina, "must be thicker than mine, though I am the taller."

"There's no harm in letting me see."

"I think there is."

"Then I will just measure them with my hands."

"No, for you would look, too."

"No, on my word of honor."

"Let us blindfold you."

"Gladly. But you must let me blindfold you as well."

"Very good. We'll play blindman's-buff."

After drinking, we all three blindfolded one another, and then the great game began and, standing in front of me, they let me measure them several times, falling on me and laughing each time I measured too far up. Having taken off my handkerchief, I saw everything, but they had to pretend they had no idea of it. They must have cheated me in the same way too, to see what it was that they felt between their thighs when they laughed so hard that they fell on me. The charming game did not end until nature, overcome with pleasure, deprived me of the strength to go on. I then restored myself to a state of decency before they took off their blindfolds, which they did when they heard my decision.

"Emilia," I said to Armellina, "has her thighs, her hips, and everything more developed than yours, but you have still to grow."

Speechless and laughing, they sat down beside me again, thinking, I know not how, that they could disavow all they had let me do. It seemed to me, though I said nothing, that Emilia had had a lover, but Armellina was untouched in every way. She seemed more humiliated than Emilia, and there was a look of far greater gentleness in her big black eyes. I wanted to take a kiss from her beautiful lips, and I found it very strange that she turned away her head, though at the same time holding my hands with all her strength.

We had spoken of the ball. They were very curious about it; it had become rather the madness than the passion of all the girls in Rome after Pope Rezzonico had kept them starved for that pleasure during all the ten years of his reign. Though he had permitted the Romans every kind of gambling game, he had forbidden them to dance; his successor Ganganelli, having different views, had forbidden gaming and given unrestricted permission for dancing. He saw no reason to prevent his subjects from hopping about. So I promised I would take them to the ball, after finding one in a quarter as far as possible from the most frequented part of Rome, where they would run no risk of being recognized. I took them back to the convent at three o'clock in the morning, well enough satisfied with all that I had done to calm my desires, though I had thereby increased my passion; I felt more convinced than ever that Armellina was a girl to be adored by any man over whom beauty had the right to exercise absolute dominion. I was one of beauty's subjects, and, to my sorrow, I am so still, destitute, even in my state, for the exhaustion of the incense had made the censer pitiable.

I reflected on the sort of enchantment which forced me again and again to fall in love with an object which, seeming to be new, inspired me with the same desires that had been inspired in me by the last object I had loved, and which I had not ceased to love until it had ceased to inspire them in me. But the object which seemed to be new—was it really so in essence? Not at all—for it was always the same play, with nothing new but its title. But when I succeeded in possessing it, did I know that it was the same object which I had enjoyed so many times before? Did I complain? Did I feel that I had been tricked? Not at all. The reason is that, enjoying the play, I kept my eyes on the playbill, on the charming title given it by the enchanting face with which I had fallen in love. But if the entire illusion comes from the title of the play, would it not be better to go to see it without having read the playbill? Of what consequence is it to know the title of a book one wants to read, the name of a dish one wants to eat, of a city whose beauties one wants to visit?

All this is literally true in the case of a city, a dish, a play; the name means nothing. But every comparison is a sophism. Man, in distinction from all the other animals, cannot fall in love with a woman except through the medium of one of his senses, all of which, except the sense of touch, have their seat in the head. For this reason, if he has eyes, it is the face which casts the all-powerful spell of love on him. The most beautiful of female bodies, offered to his eyes stark naked, but with the head covered, might excite him to lust, but never to what is called love, for if, just as he was surrendering to instinct, the woman uncovered her head, the crown of that beautiful body, and it proved to have one of those really ugly faces which inspire disgust, repugnance to the pleasure of love, and often hatred, he would flee, with a sort of horror for the animality to which he was surrendering. It is the exact opposite which occurs when a face which he finds beautiful has made a man fall in love. If he succeeds in enjoying the possessor of it, no deformity or ugliness in her body repels him; he even manages to find beauty in what, if he examines it, is ugly; but he does not care.

The empire of the face, then, being thus established in the nature of the animal man, the human race, being in intuitive possession of moral calculation in respect to all that it needs, has in every civilized country decided that the whole body must be concealed by clothing except the face, and not only the bodies of women but those of men too, who, however, in the course of the centuries, have in several provinces of Europe adopted the habit of dressing in a manner which makes it very easy for women to imagine them as they must be when they are naked. The advantage accrued to women by the establishment of this rule is incontestable, despite the fact that beautiful faces are scarcer than beautiful bodies, for art can easily give charms to a face which has none, whereas there is no cosmetic to correct the ugliness of a bosom, a belly, and all the other parts of the human body. However, I admit that the Spartan phainomerides[4] were right, like all women whose faces are repulsive though they have very beautiful bodies, for, though the play is beautiful, because of the playbill they find themselves without an audience; but it does not matter, man needs to love, and in order to fall in love he must have a title which arouses his curiosity. Woman bears it on the surface of her face. Fortunate and thrice fortunate the Armellinas, whose play is so beautiful that it surpasses expectation!

Very well satisfied with my conquest and with my certainty that I should achieve perfect happiness, I entered my room, where I found Margherita sound asleep on the sofa. I quickly undressed, and, making no noise, put out the candle, got into bed, and at once surrendered to sleep, of which I was in the greatest need. When I woke at noon Margherita told me that a very handsome gentleman had come to see me about ten o'clock and that, not having dared to wake me, she had entertained him until eleven.

"I made him coffee," she said, "which he found very good; he said he would come back tomorrow, and he would not tell me his name. He is one of the pleasantest men I have ever met. He made me a present of this coin, which I don't recognize; I hope you won't be angry."

It was the Florentine; he had given her a two-once piece.[5] It made me laugh, and, not being in the least jealous of Margherita, I told her that she had done well to entertain him and still better to accept the coin, which was worth forty-eight paoli. She kissed me fondly, and, thanks to the incident, spared me the reproaches with which she would otherwise have assailed me for coming home so late. Curious to know who this Tuscan paragon of generosity was, I read Donna Leonilda's[6] letter. He was Signor XXX,[7] a merchant established in London, who had been recommended to her husband by a Knight of Malta who was in Marseilles, from which he had arrived by sea; he was rich and his own master, amiable, well educated, and generous; she assured me that I should like him. After giving me all the news of her husband, her mother, and the whole family, she ended her letter by saying that she was happy to be six months with child, and that she would be even happier if God (for God does all things) would grant her the boon of bearing a boy. She asked me to congratulate the Marchese on it.

Whether it was due to nature or to education, the news made me shudder. I answered her a few days later, sending my letter unsealed and enclosed in a letter of congratulation which I wrote to her husband, saying that God's bounties never arrive too late and that no news had ever concerned me more. In May Leonilda gave birth to a son, whom I saw in Prague at Prince Rosenberg's[8] when I was there for the coronation of the Emperor Leopold.[9] He is called the Marchese della C. . . , like his father, who lived to the age of eighty years. Though he did not know my name, I arranged to be introduced to him, and I enjoyed his conversation on another occasion at the theater. He was with a very learned Abate who was called his tutor; but he did not need one, for at the age of twenty he had a wisdom which few men possess at sixty. What pleased me most particularly was the youth's resemblance to the late Marchese, his mother's husband. It was this thought which drew tears from me when I reflected on the satisfaction which the resemblance must have caused both that excellent man and the youth's mother. I wrote to her, and I entrusted her son with the letter. She did not receive it until he returned to Naples during the Carnival of the year 1792, and I at once received an answer in which she invited me to come to her son's wedding and to spend the rest of my days in her house. Perhaps I shall go there.

At three o'clock I found the Princess of Santa Croce in bed, with the Cardinal keeping her company. The first thing she asked me was what had made me leave the opera at the end of the second act. I replied that I should have to tell her a story six hours long, the circumstances of which were most interesting, but which I could not tell without being granted carte blanche in advance, for there were details which I should have to describe too much after nature. The Cardinal asked me if it was something in the nature of the evenings with M. M.,[10] and, having heard that it was of just that nature, he asked the Princess if she would turn a deaf ear. She replied that I could count on it, and I told them the whole story, more or less in the terms in which I have written it. The recovered oysters and the blindman's-buff made her laugh despite her deafness. At the end she agreed with the Cardinal that I had gone about it the right way, and she was sure that I would crown my labors at the first opportunity. The Cardinal told me that in two or three days I should have a dispensation from the banns for Emilia's fiancé, with which he could marry her wherever he pleased.

The next morning at nine o'clock Signor XXX came to see me, and I found him such as the Marchesa had described him to me; but I had a grudge against him because of the compliment he had paid Armellina, and it grew stronger when he asked me if the young lady who was with me was married or engaged and if she had parents or other relatives who could dispose of her. I asked him with a rather sour smile to excuse me from giving him any information about the young lady, since she had been masked at the theater. He blushed and begged my pardon. Thanking him for the honor he had done Margherita by accepting a cup of coffee from her, I asked him to do me the same favor, assuring him that I would go to breakfast with him the next day. He was staying at Roland's,[11] opposite San Carlo, another of whose guests was the famous singer Gabrielli,[12] known as La Cochetta, who was being assiduously courted by Don Giovanni Battista Borghese.[13]

As soon as the young Florentine left, I flew to San Paolo, where I could not wait to see what reception my vestals, whom I had so well initiated, would accord me. They appeared before me with their faces wearing precisely the opposite expressions to those they had worn during the preceding days. Emilia had become gay, and Armellina sad. I at once told Emilia that in three days I would bring her a full dispensation from publishing the banns, and that in a week at the most the Superioress would have a note from Cardinal Orsini to pay her four hundred scudi and dismiss her, and that on the same day I would bring her an order for a stipend of two hundred scudi, which I would collect as soon as I had her marriage certificate. Beside herself with joy over the news, she left the grating to run and tell it to the Superioress.

I thereupon took my poor Armellina's hands, and, covering them with kisses which came from my soul, I implored her to stop looking sad.

"What shall I do here," she said, "without Emilia? What shall I do here when you have gone? I am wretched. I detest myself."

I thought I should die of grief when I saw her weep after saying those few words. I could not contain myself. I promised her on my honor that I would not leave Rome before I had seen her married and procured her a dowry of a thousand scudi.

"I don't care about the thousand scudi; your promise that you will not leave Rome before you have seen me married brings me back to life, and I ask nothing more; but if you fail me it will kill me. Be sure of that."

"I give you my word, and I will die rather than fail you. Forgive the love, my dear Armellina, which perhaps led me too far astray yesterday."

"Be my faithful friend, and I forgive you everything."

"Let me for the first time kiss your beautiful lips."

After the kiss, which promised me all that I could desire, she dried her tears, and Emilia appeared with the Superioress, who spoke to me in the most flattering way possible. She said that I must prepare to take an interest in another girl whom she intended to give Armellina as a companion as soon as Emilia left. I promised her I would do whatever she bade me, and at the same time I asked her to let them go with me that evening to the play at the Tor di nona.[14]

As soon as they were alone I asked them to forgive me if I had made plans for them without their consent. Emilia replied that they would be absolute monsters if they could refuse me anything after all I had done for them.

"And you, my beautiful Armellina, will you refuse yourself to my love?"

"No, my friend, but within the limits which morality prescribes. No blindman's-buff, for example."

"Oh God, it's such a charming game! You distress me."

"Think of another," said Emilia.

Emilia had become ardent, and I did not like it, for I feared that it would make Armellina jealous. Knowing the human heart, I could entertain that fear without being conceited.

On leaving them, I went to engage a box at the Tor di nona, then to the inn to order supper in the same rooms, not forgetting the oysters, even though I was sure I should not need them again. After that I went to find a fiddler to get me three tickets for a ball where I could hope that no one would recognize me. I told him that I should be alone with two young ladies who would not dance.

Back at my lodging, and intending to dine alone, a note from the Marquise d'Aout, reproaching me for never coming to dine with her, changed my mind; I went, and I found the Florentine there. It was during the dinner that I came to know a good part of his worth; I found him such as Donna Leonilda had described him to me. Toward the end of dinner the Marquise asked me why I had not stayed until the end of the opera.

"Because the young ladies were bored."

"They do not belong to the Venetian Ambassador's household, as you told me they did; I am sure of that."

"You are right, Madame; excuse my little lie."

"It was a subterfuge to avoid telling me who they are; but it is known."

"So much the better for those who are curious."

"The one who talked to me deserves to arouse anyone's curiosity; but in your place I would have her put a little powder on her hair."

"I have no such authority, but God preserve me from imposing my will on her."

The Florentine pleased me by saying nothing. I made him talk at length about England and his business there. He told me that he was on his way to Florence to take possession of his inheritance and at the same time to look for a wife, so that he could return to London married. When I left, I told him that I should not have the honor of calling on him until the next morning but one, because of urgent business which had arisen for me. At that he had sense enough to ask me not to come until noon, so that he could have the pleasure of dining with me.

Full of my happiness, I went to fetch my girls, who enjoyed the whole comedy as I did, without the slightest interruption. On arriving at the inn, I ordered the carriage to come back at two o'clock, and we repaired to the fire, where the scullion worked away at opening oysters, which no longer interested us as they had done the first two times. The girls had each adopted the attitude toward me which was appropriate to the actual state of her affairs. Emilia had the manner of someone who, having sold excellent merchandise on credit, maintains an air of superiority because of the good bargain she has given the buyer. Armellina, tender, smiling, and a little humbled, spoke to me with her eyes and reminded me of the promise I had given her. I replied only with passionate kisses which reassured her but which at the same time made her foresee that I should want greatly to increase my obligation to her. I thought she seemed resigned; and, profoundly content, I sat down at table, confining all my attentions to her. Emilia, on the eve of marriage, had no difficulty in believing that I neglected her only because of a feeling of respect I considered due to the sacrament by which she was to bind herself.

After supper, which was as gay and voluptuous as always, I sat down on the wide sofa with Armellina, where I spent three hours which I could have made delicious if I had not insisted on obtaining the final favor. The girl would never consent to it. Yet neither my caresses nor my words nor my occasional rages could ever perturb her unvarying sweetness. Tender in my arms, now laughing, now amorously sad in the most eloquent silence, she never granted me what I persisted in demanding, yet she never appeared to refuse it to me. This may seem an enigma, but it is not one. Her failure to consent was not a refusal on her part; it was one only in respect to its result. She left my arms a virgin, perhaps sorry not to have had the courage to fail in her duty. Driven by Nature to make an end, still amorous, and little satisfied, asking her to forgive me was my only resource. It was the only way, so Nature told me, to make sure of her consent on another occasion.

We dressed, half sad, half gay, we woke Emilia, who was sleeping as if she were in her own bed; and, after taking them home, I went to recover my strength in mine, laughing at all the reproaches with which Margherita assailed me.

The Florentine gave me a little dinner for two, at which the choice and delicate fare took the smallest part of my attention. What impressed me was his protestations of friendship, his obliging expressions, his generous offers of money if I were in need of it. There must be a reason for all this, and I could not discover it. He had seen Armellina, she had pleased him, I had been short with him once when he had mentioned her to me, he had not mentioned her again, and at the dinner her name never came up. I found myself reduced to believing in sympathy; I even thought I ought to be grateful to him for it, and to do as much for him. I returned his dinner at my lodging, and I included Margherita, with whom, since I was no longer jealous of her, I wished that he might fall in love. He would not have found her making difficulties, for he pleased her, and they would both have found me willing; but nothing of the sort happened. She had praised a small ring which he wore on his watch chain, and he asked me to allow him to make her a present of it; I consented; and that was to give him a free hand; but it went no farther.

In a week everything was arranged for Emilia's marriage. I discounted her stipend, so that I could give her the money in advance, and on the same day that she left the convent she was married and went to Civitavecchia with her husband. Three days later Marcuccio married his mistress, and the next day Armellina came to the grating with the Superioress and a new girl, perhaps three or four years older than she, who was very pretty; but she interested me only a little; still in love with Armellina, and hoping to conquer her completely, I could only be indifferent to any other object. The Superioress told me that the girl, whose name was Scholastica,[15] would thenceforth be Armellina's inseparable companion, and that she was sure she would win my esteem, for she was as good as Emilia; but that in return I must do what I could to forward her in her inclination for a young man who had lucrative employment and who would be ready to marry her if he had the three hundred scudi he needed in order to do so. He was the son of a third cousin of Scholastica's; she called him her nephew, though he was older than she; the stipend could easily be bought; but to obtain it for nothing I should have to find someone who would ask the Holy Father for it. I promised her I would speak on his behalf.

The Carnival was nearing its end, and Scholastica had never seen either an opera or a play. Armellina wanted to see a ball, and I had finally found one at which I thought I could be certain that no one would recognize us; but since being recognized could have consequences, it was necessary to take precautions; I asked them if they were willing to dress as men, which I would arrange for them, and they eagerly consented. I had a box at the Teatro Aliberti for the day after the ball, so I told them to ask the Superioress for permission, and to expect me toward dusk, when I would come to fetch them as usual in one of the Santa Croces' carriages. Though disheartened by Armellina's resistance and by the presence of her new companion, who I thought was neither a girl to be hurried into anything nor one to be left to stare at the wall, I nevertheless had everything we needed to dress the two girls as men taken to the inn to which we always went.

Getting into the carriage, Armellina told me the bad news that Scholastica knew nothing about our relation and that we must not permit ourselves the slightest liberty in her presence. I did not have time to answer her. The other girl got in, and we went to the inn, where we had no sooner entered the room in which there was a good fire than I said in a tone which betrayed ill-humor that if they insisted upon being perfectly free I would go into the other room, though it was cold there. So saying, I showed them the men's clothing. Armellina replied that it would be enough if I would turn my back, adding:

"Isn't that so, Scholastica?"

"I'll do as you do; but I'm very sorry, for I'm sure I'm in your way. You love each other, and it's perfectly clear: I prevent you from giving each other tokens of it. I am not a child. I am your friend, but you do not treat me like a friend."

At this discourse, which proceeded from common sense, but which required a good deal of intelligence to be so well expressed, I breathed again.

"You are right, beautiful Scholastica," I said, "I love Armellina and she is looking for an excuse not to give me tokens of it, for she does not love me."

So saying, I left the room and shut the door. I fell to making a fire. A quarter of an hour later Armellina knocked and asked me to open the door. She was wearing breeches. She said that they absolutely needed me because, the shoes being too small, they could not get them on. I sulked, so she threw herself on my neck, and she had no difficulty in soothing me; I was justifying myself to her, at the same time covering everything I could see with kisses, when Scholastica broke in on us, giving a great laugh.

"I was sure," she said, "that I was in your way; but if you do not trust me completely I warn you that I shall not have the pleasure of going to the opera with you tomorrow."

"Very well," said Armellina, "embrace my friend too."

"Here I am."

I was displeased by such generosity on Armellina's part; but that did not keep me from giving Scholastica the kisses which she deserved, and which I would have given her even if she had been ugly, for so much such kind consideration was not to be scorned. I even gave her amorous kisses, intending to punish Armellina; but I was deceived. I saw that she was delighted, she kissed her friend fondly, as if to thank her for her readiness to help, and at that I went to the other room with them to see what was the matter. I made them sit down, and I saw there was nothing for it but to send out for shoes for them; I sent the waiter on the errand, with orders to come back with a shoemaker who would bring all the shoes he had in his shop. While we waited for the shoemaker, love imperiously commanded me not to confine myself to kisses with Armellina. She did not dare to refuse either me or herself; but as if in exculpation, she insisted that I give Scholastica the same caresses I had given her, and Scholastica, to make her easy, eagerly accepted anything I could have demanded of her if I had been in love with her. The girl was charming, she fell short of Armellina only in sweetness and a delicacy of features which was Armellina's alone. The toying, all in all, was not displeasing to me, but my reflections filled me with bitterness. What I saw made me certain that Armellina did not love me, and that if Scholastica made me no resistance it was only to put her friend at ease and to convince her that she could trust her completely. I saw that, before the shoemaker arrived, I must by hook or crook make myself desire Scholastica. I at once became curious to see if Armellina would not change her attitude when I showed that I was really in love with her friend, and if the latter would continue to grant me what could not but seem to her too much, for until then my hands had never gone beyond the boundaries which the belt of her breeches opposed to their reach.

The shoemaker arrived, and in a few minutes they had shoes which fitted them perfectly. After that I helped them on with their coats, and I saw two very pretty girls dressed as elegant young men and such as to make anyone who saw them with me envy my good fortune. After I ordered that supper should be ready at midnight, we went downstairs and on to the house which was to be the scene of the ball and where it was a safe bet that I would not be recognized, for the fiddler whom I had paid for the three tickets had assured me that the company consisted entirely of shopkeepers.

I enter the ballroom with my two metamorphosed beauties, and the first person who strikes me is the Marquise d'Aout with her husband and the Abbé. The usual exchange of compliments follows, and the expected persiflage on the subject of my two companions, who, having no acquaintance with society, stood there as if stricken dumb; but what annoyed me to death was a tall young lady who, finishing a minuet, came and bowed to Armellina to invite her to dance with her. The young lady was the Florentine, who had taken it into his head to dress as a girl. He made a perfect beauty. Armellina, thinking that she should not let herself be taken for a dupe, said that she recognized him, and he replied with no little quickness that she was no doubt mistaken for he had a brother who looked just like him, just as she must have a sister with the same face as hers to whom his brother had spoken in a box at the Teatro Capranica. This well-sustained riposte by the Florentine set the Marquise laughing, and, though reluctantly, I laughed too. Armellina having declined the honor of dancing with him, the Marquise made her sit down between herself and the Florentine, and the Marquis made off with Scholastica; politeness demanded that I devote all my attention to the Marquise and not even look at Armellina, to whom the Florentine was talking in a way which occupied her completely. Jealous as a tiger, and having to dissimulate, my reader can imagine how much I suffered and how greatly I repented of having come to the ball. But the cruelty of my situation increased when, a quarter of an hour later, I saw Scholastica leave the Marquis d'Aout and stand talking in a corner to a respectable-looking man of indeterminate age who seemed to be treating her to a most interesting discourse.

The minuets over for the time being, lines are formed for a contradance, and I am surprised to see Armellina beside the Florentine, she as a man, he as a girl. I approach them to compliment them, and in the sweetest of tones I ask Armellina if she is sure she knows how to dance a contradance.

"The Signore told me," she replied, "that I cannot go wrong if I will just do whatever he does."

I am left without an answer. I go toward Scholastica, very curious about the man who was speaking to her. She timidly introduces him to me, saying that he is her nephew, the man who wanted to make her happy by obtaining permission to marry her. My surprise was great, but I conceal it perfectly; I say all the polite and encouraging things I can to him, telling him that the Superioress had informed me and that I had already thought of such a way to obtain it from the Holy Father's bounty that permission for them to marry would cost neither him nor her a soldo. He commends himself to my good offices, saying that he is not rich, and I am comforted to see that he feels not even a twinge of jealousy.

I leave Scholastica with him, and I look in amazement at Armellina, who is dancing very well and never at a loss in a figure. The Florentine, who was a master, guided her superbly; they had all the air of a happy couple; I fumed inwardly; but I did not let it keep me from congratulating Armellina after the contradance and praising the Florentine, who played the lady to perfection; he was so skillfully dressed that one would have said he had a bosom. It was Madame d'Aout who had tricked him out so well. Since I could not bring myself not to observe everything that Armellina did, I declined to dance, but managing always to show not a trace of ill-humor. Scholastica, still with her fiancé and occupied in talk of great interest to them both, gave me no uneasiness. She conversed with him for three hours, until the time when I went to ask her if she was willing that we should leave. It was getting on toward midnight, an hour which I could not wait to see arrive, for the anguish I had endured had made me heap a thousand curses on the ball and my kindness in taking the girls to it.

But I was no little embarrassed at half past eleven o'clock. It was a Saturday, and the whole company was waiting for midnight to go to eat meat, either at an inn or wherever each of them had decided to go. The Marquise d'Aout, enchanted by Armellina's ingenuous talk, told me pleasantly, and at the same time commandingly, to come to supper at her house with my two companions.

"Madame, I cannot have that honor, and my two companions know the reason for it."

"This one" (Armellina) "has just told me that it is entirely for you to say."

"It is a subterfuge, believe me."

I turn to Armellina, and I say with a smile and all the sweetness I was able to counterfeit, that she well knew she had to be at home at the latest by half an hour after midnight; and she replies with unfeigned sweetness that it is true, but that nevertheless it is for me to decide. I reply a little sadly that it is not for me to decide to break my word, but that she has the power to decide me to do it. At that the Marquise, and the Marquis, seconded by the Florentine, urge Armellina to use her power and oblige me to break the promise I claimed to have made, and Armellina ventures to urge me accordingly. I was furious, but resolved to do anything rather than give her the slightest reason to think me jealous. I say to Armellina in the most natural manner that I am willing if her friend will consent; and, with a satisfaction which rends my soul, she replies by sending me off to ask her for the favor.

Sure that I am safe, I go to the other end of the room, and, in her fiancé's presence, I tell Scholastica the whole story, at the same time asking her not to consent but without involving me. Her relative praises my prudence; but Scholastica does not need me to ask her to play the role, she tells me clearly that she would never consent to go to sup with anyone. She then comes with me, and, on the way, I tell her that she must speak to Armellina privately. So I take her to the Marquise, complaining that I have not succeeded. Scholastica asks to be excused and tells Armellina to come and hear what she has to say to her. They talked together for some time, then they came back downcast, and Armellina said she was sorry, but it was absolutely impossible. At that the Marquise stopped insisting, and about midnight we left. I urged silence on Scholastica's lover, asking him to come to dine with me on the second day in Lent. He was a man forty years of age, modest, pleasing, who greatly interested me in his favor.

The night being very dark, as it was bound to be at the end of the Carnival, I left the house with the two girls, sure that I should not be followed and going to find the carriage where I knew it would be. Escaping from a hell in which I had suffered like one of the damned for four hours, I arrived at the inn without saying a word to either girl, and not answering the reasonable questions which the too natural Armellina put to me. Scholastica avenged me by reproaching her for having obliged me to appear either rude or jealous or ready to break my word.

When we were in our room Armellina all at once changed my jealous rage to pity; I saw her beautiful eyes showing unmistakable signs of the tears which the truths Scholastica had told her had made her shed in the carriage. Supper being already served, they had time only to take off their shoes. I was sad, and I had reason to be so, but Armellina's sadness distressed me; it was a barrier; I had to dissipate it, though the source of it could not but drive me to despair, for I could find it nowhere but in the liking she had taken to the Florentine. Our supper was exquisite, Scholastica did it justice, but for once Armellina ate scarcely anything. Scholastica gave rein to a natural gaiety, she kissed her friend, she begged her to share in her happiness, for, her lover having become my friend, she was sure that I would use my influence for him and for her, just as I had done for Emilia. She blessed the ball and the chance which had brought him there. She proved to Armellina that she had no reason to be sad, since she was sure that I loved her alone.

But Scholastica was mistaken; and Armellina did not dare to enlighten her friend by telling her the real cause of her sadness. On my side, self-esteem prevented me from telling her, for I knew that I was in the wrong. Armellina was thinking of marriage, I was not the sort of man for her, and the handsome Florentine was. Our supper ended without Armellina's having been able to recover her good humor. She drank only one glass of punch, and, since she had eaten very little, I did not urge her to drink more, for fear it would make her ill. Scholastica, on the contrary, who was tasting the delicious beverage for the first time, helped herself to it freely and thought it amusing that instead of going into her stomach it had risen to her head. In this state of gaiety she thought it was her duty to make perfect peace between us and to assure us that she would be no hindrance even if she were present at all the proofs of love which we could give each other.

She rose from the table and, controlling her legs with difficulty, she carried her friend to the sofa, pressing her to her bosom and giving her countless kisses, which made Armellina laugh despite her sadness. She called me, she made me sit down beside her, and put her into my arms. I gave her amorous caresses, which Armellina did not refuse but to which she did not accord the return which Scholastica hoped to see and for which I did not hope, for she would never have granted me in Scholastica's presence what she had not granted me during the three hours I had had her in my arms while Emilia was sound asleep. Scholastica, who did not want to fail in her mediation, put the blame on me: she reproached me with a coldness which I was far from feeling. I told them to take off their disguises and put their dresses on again. So saying, I helped Scholastica to take off her coat and her vest, whereupon Armellina did the same. I offered them their shifts, and at that Armellina told me to go and stand by the fire; but two minutes later the sound of kisses made me curious. Scholastica, more than gay from the punch, was covering Armellina's bosom with kisses, while Armellina, at last become cheerful, did as much to her ardent friend in my presence. The sight so worked upon Scholastica that she did not object to my doing justice to the beauty of her bosom and becoming a babe at the breast. At that Armellina felt ashamed to be less generous to me than her friend, and Scholastica triumphed when she saw for the first time the use to which I put Armellina's hands, whereupon, fearing for her good repute, Armellina demanded that Scholastica serve me in the same way. She did everything, and her astonishment, for though the girl was twenty years of age she knew nothing about such matters, delighted me.

After the explosion I put on their shifts and with the utmost decency took off their breeches. They went to the water closet with their arms around each other, and when they came back they sat on my lap. Scholastica, far from being annoyed at the preference I at once showed for the secret beauties of Armellina, seemed to be fascinated; she watched my maneuvers, and the way in which Armellina lent herself to my undertaking, with the greatest attention, hoping to see the thing which I should have been very glad to show her, but which Armellina would not grant me. Unable to conclude where I wanted to, I called a halt, remembering that I had duties to Scholastica, whose beauties, which were hidden under a long shift, I also wanted to bare for my eyes. Armellina's obliging friend offered me no resistance. She was too sure that she would leave the question unanswered. It was too hard to decide which of the two was the more beautiful; but Armellina had the advantage of being loved, Scholastica's advantage was the beauty of her face. My hand felt that she was as untouched as Armellina, and from the way in which she held herself I clearly saw that she left me the lord of everything; but I hesitated to take advantage of the moment. It was too fine a triumph to owe it to intoxication. However, I ended by doing everything which a skilled practitioner can do to give all the pleasure possible to the charming object whom he deprives of the final pleasure. Scholastica succumbed, voluptuously overcome, and convinced that I had only failed to fulfill her desires from respect and delicacy.

Armellina, all smiles, ingenuously congratulated us both. I felt ashamed. Scholastica begged her pardon. I took them back to their convent, assuring them that I would call for them the next day to take them to the opera, and I went home to bed, unable to decide whether I had won or lost in the game I had played. It was not until I woke the next morning that I was able to decide the question.

EXTRACT FROM CHAPTERS IV AND V[1]

AFTER THE opera on Shrove Sunday Armellina, urged on by Scholastica's example, yields to my love; and I enjoy their company again for the last time on the last day of the Carnival, after appearing on horseback on the Corso[2] dressed as Pierrot, thinking that no one recognized me. But this is what happened to me. I stop beside a triumphal car, and I am surprised to see a masker disguised as a warrior in the costume of the ancient Romans put his left hand on my horse's reins and with his right hand give a pen and paper to a woman masker dressed as a queen who sat beside him. The queen writes, hands the paper to the warrior, who hands it to me and at the same time lets go of my horse's reins. At the same moment a musical prelude strikes up and all the maskers in the car throw handfuls of sweetmeats at me. After that they fall in with the procession. I read the note, expecting only an ordinary pasquinade, but I am surprised to read the following:

Pierrot audacieux, tremble: voici ton sort,
Je t'ai sauvé du Muran à Venise,
Mais cette nuit, je te condamne à mort,
Tu rendras l'âme en changeant de chemise.

("Audacious Pierrot, tremble: this is your fate. I saved you from Murano, Venice, but tonight I sentence you to death. You shall give up your soul when you change your shirt.")

I instantly guessed that the warrior could be only Cardinal de Bernis and the Queen only his beautiful Princess. There was no one but he who could remind me of what had happened to me seventeen years before.[3] Only he could be the author of the impromptu. I leave the Corso, I go to the door of a coffeehouse, and I write the following four lines; then I return to the Corso and hand them to the queen.

Je signe à ta sentence, adorable déesse;
Mais de ma mort laisse-moi donc le choix.
Mon crime, en bon chrétien, au guerrier je confesse.
J'expierai content, mais sur la sainte croix.

("I accept your sentence, adorable goddess; but leave me the choice of my death. As a good Christian, I confess my crime to the warrior. I will gladly expiate it, but on the holy cross."[4])

On the second day in Lent I received from the Superioress all the papers I needed for Scholastica's marriage, and the Princess and the Cardinal exerted themselves to such purpose that she left the convent after Easter and was married.

On the first Sunday in Lent the Marquise d'Aout had me to dinner with the Florentine XXX, who, informing me of his honorable intentions in regard to Armellina, had no difficulty in persuading me to play the leading role in the matter by taking the place of her father. I arranged the whole thing in one week. He provided her with a dowry of ten thousand scudi, which he deposited in the Spirito Santo Bank,[5] and after Easter he married her, then he took her with him to Florence and from there to England, where she now lives happily.

It was on this occasion that I presented myself to Cardinal Orsini, who, being Prince of the Accademia degli Infecondi,[6] arranged for me to receive the honor of becoming a member of it. He stipulated that I should recite an ode in honor of the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ at the next meeting, which was to be held on Good Friday. To compose the ode, I decided to spend a few days in the country, and I chose Frascati, where I thought I could live a solitary life. I had promised Mariuccia that I would visit her. She had assured me that I would enjoy making the acquaintance of her family, and I was curious to do so. I left three weeks before Easter; I arrived in Frascati toward nightfall, and the next day, having sent for a wigmaker, I saw before me Mariuccia's husband, who at once recognized me.

After telling me that he dealt in grain, that he was prospering in his business, and that he practiced the trade of wigmaker only because he enjoyed it, he offered me a room and very modestly invited me to dinner. I was extremely surprised when he told me that he would introduce me to my daughter, to whom he had given the name Giacomina at her baptism. I thought I ought not to admit it, I laughed, I told him the thing was impossible, and he calmly told me that I would admit it when I saw her. This makes me extremely curious; here is yet another intrigue which may have consequences; but in any case the girl can be only a child nine or ten years old, and my being her father must be extremely doubtful, for the wigmaker had married Mariuccia only four weeks after my first amorous interview with her.

But at noon her face struck me. She had my features beautified; and she was much more beautiful than Sophie, whom I had had by Teresa Pompeati[7] whom I had left in London.

Giacomina was very tall for her age and very well built. I looked at her very little; but I saw that she was examining me attentively, in the silence of concentration. I seized the first opportunity to ask Mariuccia on what grounds her husband could have told me that Giacomina was my daughter, and she replied, as if it were nothing at all, that he was as sure of it as she was, and that it did not prevent him from loving her more than all his other children.

"But the child does not know she is not your husband's daughter."

"Of course not. One does not confide such secrets to children."

I found Mariuccia's house very clean, and the room which her husband, Clemente, offered me having pleased me, I let him have my portmanteau brought there from the inn.

Mariuccia informed me privately that I would dine with an unmarried woman called Signora Veronica,[8] who kept a drawing school, at which Giacomina was studying and making astonishing progress.

"The woman," she told me, "will come with her supposed niece, a pretty, very clever girl and a great friend of Giacomina's. She is thirteen years of age. Her aunt knows you; but she knew your brother Zanetto[9] much better. We have talked about you a great deal, and she will be very pleasantly surprised when she sees you."

And so she was when she saw me; but not more than I when I saw her niece, who resembled my brother in the most telltale way imaginable. I guessed all. Signora Veronica, seated beside me at the table, after telling me that the girl was the daughter of a sister of hers who was dead, said to me at dessert that I would be her brother-in-law if my brother had been a man of honor. She could not say more to lead me to suppose that her pretended niece was her daughter and that I was her uncle. At this news, I made up my mind to love the niece; and what I found amusing and extraordinary was that I found that what had decided me to pursue this passing amour was a kind of vengeance. I leave it to physicians who are more learned than I to interpret phenomena of this kind. My pretty niece was named Guglielmina, and throughout the dinner I constantly found her charming. Giacomina said very little, but she seemed to me to be thinking a great deal. After dinner I took a solitary walk at the Villa Ludovisi.

How many were my reflections when I found myself in the place where precisely twenty-seven years earlier I had been with Donna Lucrezia![10] I saw the place, and found it more beautiful, whereas I found myself not only not the same but diminished in all my faculties, except experience, which I abused and which made up to me for nothing except when it gave me a better right to reason. Wretched gain! Reasoning led me to melancholy, the pitiless mother of the horrible idea of death, which I had not the strength to face like a Stoic. Strength beyond my strength, which I was never able to acquire, and which I shall never acquire! This weakness has never made me a coward, but, even though abhorring its cause, I have never been able to understand how a thinking man can be indifferent to it.

As always, I put aside these somber ideas, reflecting that, except for La Corticelli, I had bestowed happiness on every girl I had loved. Lucia from Pasiano had ended in ignominy only because, obeying my finer feelings, I had respected her. She had become the victim of a base courier who could lead her nowhere but to ruin.

Toward dusk I went home, and I remained in my room until suppertime. I spent four hours vainly trying to begin the ode on the Redemption which I had promised Cardinal Orsini. The ode is a kind of composition which does not depend on the poet's will. It can come neither from his brain nor from his pen, unless Apollo sends it to him. This time, Apollo scorned me, for, as I invoked him, I was thinking of Guglielmina, for whom the god cared nothing. I supped with Clemente and his wife, who was with child; he hoped for a boy. I could not but wish him that satisfaction.

He left me alone with his wife, which was most considerate; but at that moment I thought her too much the bourgeoise. I spent a very pleasant hour, but only in conversation. Mariuccia was full of her happiness, and, believing that she owed it to me, she could forbid herself to love the bestower of it, but not to adore him. These are natural feelings, which cost nothing; but the greater includes the lesser. I saw Mariuccia at my disposal, but I wanted only Guglielmina. She told me that her aunt had left her with Giacomina.

"They are upstairs," she said, "together in the same bed. I am sure they're sound asleep; would you like us to go up and see them?"

"Let us go, but we must not wake them."

We go up on tiptoe. I see two beds; her two younger daughters were asleep in one of them; in the other I see Guglielmina and my daughter, both asleep on their backs, both pretty and both with the heightened color of those roses which blush on the cheeks of young girls and boys only when they are asleep. The coverlet allowed a view of the two little maids' bosoms. My daughter's was ungarnished; but the other resembled the swellings one sees on the head of a calf which is about to grow its horns. Neither their hands nor their forearms were exposed. What a vision! What enchantment! Mariuccia laughs at my admiration, but she wants to increase it. She takes it upon herself to raise the coverlet slowly and display to my covetous soul two charming images which, to make a perfectly new picture, needed only that I could not expect it. I see the two innocents, each with an arm reaching down her belly and a hand just curved over the tokens of her puberty, which were beginning to show. The middle finger, still more curved, was held motionless on the little piece of almost imperceptibly rounded flesh. It was the only moment in my life when I knew for a certainty the true temper of my soul, and I was satisfied with it. I felt a delicious horror. This new feeling forced me to cover the two nudities myself; my hands shook. What a betrayal! It was of a kind as new as it was cruel. Mariuccia did not have a mind able to comprehend the greatness of it. She had in all good faith betrayed the greatest secret of two innocent souls at the moment of their greatest confidence. They might well have died of grief if they had waked when I was contemplating their beautiful posture. Only the most invincible ignorance of one thing could have saved them from death, and I could not suppose they were ignorant of it.

I at once left the room, and Mariuccia followed to show me to mine, where what happened would certainly not have happened save for the picture by which I had just been overwhelmed; but Mariuccia, instead of taking it as a punishment, chose to consider it a recompense for the pleasure she thought she had procured me. I let her believe whatever she pleased, and she went off to bed with her husband. Alas! The thing had not been premeditated. If she had not calmed me, I could not have gone to sleep.

I woke at daybreak, and I laughed as I thought of my ode. I found myself Guglielmina's slave. I could have composed no verses except for her. With his arrows Cupid defied a gloomy Apollo who could only have unstrung his bow with the lugubrious subject of the death of the Creator. Just as Clemente was dressing my hair, the two charming friends entered. Giacomina brought me my chocolate on a tray, the other was carrying a roll of paper. It contained drawings. In both their faces was depicted a gaiety which sprang from innocence, candor, and confidence. If they had known what had happened to them during the night, they would not have dared to appear before me. Guglielmina would have been inconsolable if she had been told that what I had seen had made me fall in love with her.

The earliest sentiment of a girl who has the true seed of intelligence is coquetry; it is the only sentiment she values, for it is the only one which assures her that she can make a lover constant. Guglielmina at her age would have hated me if she had known that, so far as my eyes were concerned, I had already become her lord and master despite her. As for my daughter, at nine years of age she could not have such mature ideas. I asked them to let me see the products of their pencils.

After showing some little reluctance, they handed me the notebook. Nearly all the figures were naked—men, women, statues, groups of children—all were pretty and all copied after excellent studies from the nude. The Apollo Belvedere, Antinoüs, Hercules, and that reclining Venus of Titian's who holds her hand just where I had seen those of the dear girls. The psychological phenomenon which I observed at that moment, and which gave me the greatest pleasure, was a dispute between Guglielmina and my daughter.

My daughter did not want me to linger over the Venus, and Guglielmina laughed at her. She claimed that I should not linger over the Antinoüs or the Apollo, for, being a man, I could find nothing new in the drawings of them; then too, they ought not to let me know that they had ventured to draw them. The pleasure I took in their dispute filled my soul; but I was at a loss when they chose me to decide between their opinions.

"I do not know," I said at last, "which of you is right; but if I consider the pleasure your drawings give me I will say that the Venus interests me more than Antinoüs."

The amusing thing is that each of them thought she was the victor, and Guglielmina refused to hear any further explanation. I have all my life attributed the greatest importance to these trifles, which served to show me the course I must follow to enter the hearts of those whom I sought to conquer.

They went off to school, and when I was dressed I went to call on Signora Veronica. There I saw seven or eight girls, all very young. None of them could take my mind from Guglielmina. To have a reason for going to the school often, I asked the mistress of it to paint my portrait in miniature; as she was not rich, she could not but be delighted to earn six zecchini; and the next day I promised Guglielmina six zecchini too to make a crayon portrait of me in my dressing gown and nightcap. To do so, she had to come to my room very early. But when, the next day, she kept me waiting, Giacomina told her she ought to stay and sleep with her, her mother Mariuccia agreed, and her aunt willingly consented. At that I hoped for everything. On the fourth day of my stay in Frascati, Guglielmina came alone to sup with us, and, to banish any notion of jealousy from my dear Giacomina's mind, I bought a gold watch with a clasp from her father and made her a present of it after supper. The child was mad with joy; on the pretext of gratitude, she began giving me countless caresses, which I had some difficulty in receiving as became a father. The whole little town was whispering that I was certainly her father, and Mariuccia and her husband were not sorry to have it believed. Giacomina suspected it; but she did not know what direction to give to the ideas which were floating in her young mind. Boldly accepting my challenge, she began coming into my bed after I had lain down in it, and making fun of the clear-sighted Guglielmina, who was afraid to do likewise. I did no more than give my daughter fond kisses on her beautiful lips and on her eyes in Guglielmina's presence, while Guglielmina laughed at our trifling. I said to her carelessly that four years' difference in age meant nothing, and that I would treat her as a child too if she were in Giacomina's place. This slighting attitude finally had the effect it was meant to have after three or four days. I gave her six zecchini for her drawing, which her aunt retouched, and that evening she got into bed with me, where my daughter, on my other side, was delighted when she saw that I treated her in the same way —plenty of kisses, but nothing more. When they were tired they went off to their room and to bed; but I was sure that Guglielmina knew from the kisses I gave her that, though I restrained myself, I had expectations of more solid fare. The next morning before leaving for school they told Mariuccia in my presence how they drove me frantic in my bed before they went off to theirs. The worthy woman laughed, knowing already how the thing would end.

Three or four days later Giacomina fell asleep, or pretended to, and a few minutes afterward Guglielmina did the same and let me do whatever I pleased up to a certain point, at which she thought it best to wake. She saw me looking so content that she thought she would gain most by making no complaint. She wanted to let me believe that, having been asleep, she had not been aware of anything at all; she woke Giacomina and they left together; but the next morning I made her a present of a pretty ring which was worth at least fifty scudi, and which earned me the thanks of her aunt the same evening at supper. The crayon being finished, she proposed to take the girl home with her, and I was in terror. My daughter protested to the point of tears, and Signora Veronica smilingly yielded. She said to me that I had good reason to love her niece, the same reason, she went on, which Giacomina had for loving her. She thought she had propounded an insoluble enigma.

After she had gone, the two girls, left alone with me, let themselves be persuaded to do the honors to another bowl of punch and, after seeing me in bed, came to drive me frantic, as they put it; but as soon as my daughter really went to sleep, I did not sink to letting my dear Guglielmina employ the same stratagem a second time. I clearly saw that I could count on her affection, and I was not mistaken. I spoke the language of love to her, using its most eloquent terms without waiting for her answers and not coming to the crowning act until I heard her moaning. She gave herself to me heedless of the fact that Giacomina had sat up and was watching our performance with equal attention and astonishment. When the sweet combat ended, Giacomina became the object of all our caresses, and we had no difficulty in assuring ourselves of her silence; but she wanted to be instructed in everything and to see at close range just how the thing was done. During the following days we had to satisfy her curiosity in every respect. I vainly tried to convince her that, because of her age, I could not possibly treat her in the same way; she summoned me to the lists, and she roused me to pity. Guglielmina finally felt obliged to tell her that she was very probably my daughter, and that I must not take the risk of committing a dreadful crime which would make us both unhappy for the rest of our lives. She was horrified at the thought, and so became reasonable, stifling her passion as well as she could. What Nature excited her to do could only increase my voluptuous enjoyment, and Guglielmina could not take exception to a toying of which she became the chief beneficiary. But now for a very fortunate event, not unlike a number of others which have made me superstitious.

The next day at table Mariuccia reminded me that she had had the good fortune in Rome to give me a number on which I had staked and which, having been drawn, had made the whole company win.[11] Giacomina said that she had a number she was sure of, and, without waiting to be asked what number it was, she named twenty-seven. Mariuccia cried out, remembering, as I did, that the num- ber that she had given me ten years earlier was twenty-seven.

No more was needed; I said that I would stake on it then and there; Clemente said that it was too late to stake in Frascati, and that I must send the number to be staked on in Rome. The drawing for the lottery was to take place on the next day but one. I declare that a trustworthy man must be sent to Rome at once, and Clemente says that he will go himself. I encourage him, and he at once goes to order a horse and to put on riding clothes.

I at once write down the number twenty-seven, on which twenty-five Roman scudi are to be staked unconditionally for the benefit of five partners. The partners were Mariuccia, Clemente, Giacomina, Guglielmina, and Signora Veronica. I then add twenty-five scudi for myself, ordering that it be staked on the twenty-seven at the second drawing. I give the fifty scudi to Clemente, who sets off at once, promising that he will be back by supper-time.

Mariuccia said she was sure she would win, but my daughter looked sad.

"We shall win," she said to me, "and you will not. Why do you insist that the number will be drawn second rather than first, third, fourth, or fifth?"

"Because it pleases me to trust Fortune without reservations. Because this is the second time I have been given the twenty-seven. And because I want to win five times as much as the rest of you."

"But it is five times as difficult. It seems to me that your reasoning is faulty."

"If the twenty-seven comes out at the second drawing, I will take you all to Rome and keep you there through all of Holy Week."

"God grant that it comes out!"

Clemente was back at eleven o'clock and gave me my receipt, keeping the other himself. After supper Mariuc-cia whispered to me that she had not failed to change my sheets. I thanked her, embracing her fondly and assuring her that we should go to Rome.

Guglielmina had become my angel. On this second night I found her so amorous that I forgave my brother for all follies. I hoped I should find him still in Rome, so that I could express my gratitude to him and thank him for having created such a jewel for my soul's consolation. Guglielmina sighed in my arms, thinking of the cruel day when I should leave her. I thought I could venture to promise that I would marry her, provided that her aunt would consent. She replied that she was sure her aunt would consent; but I was sure of the contrary. The poor child did not know that she was my brother's daughter.

But what joy the next day when the five numbers drawn in the Roman lottery were posted! The second number drawn was twenty-seven. Giacomina fell on my neck, and then all the household. Signora Veronica came and struggled to express her gratitude. She saw that, through me, she had come into possession of a hundred and fifty Roman scudi, as Clemente had of two hundred and twenty-five. I had won eight hundred and seventy-five, a sum of money to which I could not be indifferent, for after the expenses of the Carnival my exchequer was reaching its end.

The Roman scudo is worth half a zecchino. My daughter made the whole company laugh by asking me why I had not staked on twenty-seven at the second drawing for everyone. Clemente came and embraced me and admitted that he had staked on the twenty-seven too—ten scudi that it would be drawn second. He won seven hundred and fifty scudi; I congratulated him most sincerely. I then repeated my promise that I would keep them in Rome for the whole of Holy Week at my expense. Signora Veronica excused herself because of her school, and Clemente because of his shop. The party consisted of Mariuccia, with Giacomina and Guglielmina, and me; and we left at daybreak on Sunday.

What pleasure to find myself adored by three such creatures! These good moments in my life were the ones which made me a hundred times happier than the bad ones made me unhappy. I took them to my lodging, regardless of Margherita, who pouted when I ordered her mother to put two beds for me in the room next to mine, in which Ceruti had lodged. After ordering Margherita's mother to prepare dinner and supper for five until the day after Easter, I took them to St. Peter's in one of Roland's carriages, and everywhere during the course of the week. What calmed Margherita was my granting her the favor of dining with us; and she could not object when I told her I could not let her enter my room after supper during all of that week. I left her to suppose that it would be Signora Mariuccia who would come to sleep with me. Seeing Giacomina, she did not find it hard to guess that she was my daughter and that I must have loved her mother ten years before. I let her suppose what she pleased about Guglielmina. After supper Mariuccia went to bed, and the two girls came to my room as they had done in Frascati. I spent a very happy week, though at great cost, for I spent more than four hundred zecchini for fabrics, linen, and all sorts of jewelry, not forgetting Signora Veronica, to whom Guglielmina took all the presents I bought expressly for her.

It was on the night of Holy Thursday that I composed the ode which I recited the next day at the meeting of the Infecondi, where I saw Cardinal de Bernis and Cardinal Giambattista Rezzonico,[12] who asked me to give him a copy of my ode, which I recited by heart, shedding a torrent of tears. All the Academicians wept. The only way to draw tears is to shed them oneself; but one must have grief depicted on a face which is able to arouse emotion without making grimaces; I had such a face, and the poetry gave me (as poetry still gives me today) the essential nature of the subject treated. Cardinal de Bernis, who knew my cast of mind, told me four days later that he had never believed that I was so great an actor. I swore to him that, at the moment, I had felt that I was sincere, and, after thinking about it for a little, he admitted that it was possible.

On the day after Easter I went back to Frascati with Mariuccia and her daughter and Guglielmina, whose despair rent my soul.

I dined, supped, and slept there for the last time, and Signora Veronica showed a lively sense of my generosity when Guglielmina gave her all the presents I had chosen for her; but she greatly distressed me the next day when I went to take leave of her an hour before my departure. She took me aside to tell me that, seeing Guglielmina's tears, she could not help concluding that I had made her fall in love with me, and, after presenting a number of very sad considerations for my reflection, she demanded that I tell her on my word of honor if anything too serious had taken place between her and me. I assured her on my word of honor that her tears could derive only from a love born of gratitude, and she seemed to be satisfied.

Can one put a gentleman on his honor to reveal a secret which honor itself forbids him to reveal? God knows what I suffered at that cruel parting. All partings are heartbreaking, and the last one always seems worse than all those which have gone before; I should have died a hundred times if God had not given me a well-tempered soul, which easily comes to terms with the inevitable and in a few days is calm. They who call this forgetting are wrong. Forgetting comes from weakness; to calm oneself by adopting another course comes from a strength which may be reckoned among the virtues. As for Guglielmina, she was fortunate. Four years later she became the wife of a painter who is still distinguished today. It was Clemente who gave me news of her whenever I grew curious enough to write to him. He became rich and seven or eight years later returned to Rome, where he entered into partnership with a grain merchant who married Giacomina; but the marriage was not happy. She was widowed at the age of twenty years, and she left Rome with a Count from Palermo who married her after the death of his wife.

When I left Venice in the year 1783 God ought to have sent me to Rome or Naples or Sicily or Parma, and in all likelihood my old age would have been happy. My Genius, which is always right, took me to Paris to save my brother Francesco, whom I found sunk in debt and on the verge of going to the Temple.[13] That he owes me his restoration is of no moment to me, but I congratulate myself on having accomplished it. If he were grateful to me, I should consider myself repaid; I prefer that he should bear the burden of his debt, which must weigh heavily on him from time to time. He deserves no greater punishment. Today, in the seventy-third year of my life,[14] I need only to live in peace and far from anyone who can suppose that he has rights over my moral freedom, for that supposition cannot but be accompanied by a kind of tyranny.

After my too lively stay in Frascati I spent six weeks in Rome enjoying the society of the Palazzo Santa Croce, frequenting my Academy, and without any new love affair. Margherita, who always made me laugh, was enough for me.

During this time Father Stratico, who is today Bishop of Lesina and who had introduced me to the beautiful Marchesa Chigi in Siena,[15] came to Rome to pass the examination for Maestro. This is the Doctor's degree of the Dominican monks. I had the pleasure of being present at the examination he had to take to be accepted as a theologian-at-large. The four examining theologians and the General of the Order[16] were present. The four monks, who are very strict, give the candidate the thorniest ques- tions in all theology; they think that they cannot appear very learned in their General's eyes unless they embarrass the candidate, who, if he happens to be more learned than they, must take great care to conceal the fact, for they refuse him, and their decision is without appeal; and my reader knows, I believe, what the science of theology is. Being very curious about this ludicrous doctorate, at which Stratico himself laughed in secret, I called on him in the morning, expecting to find him with St. Thomas in hand, conferring with a pack of friars;[17] but instead I find him with a hand of cards, absorbed in a game of piquet against another monk who was cursing Fortune.

"I thought," I say, "that I should find you deep in study"

He replies:

"Oportet studuisse ['One has to have studied']."

I left him, assuring him that I should soon be present at his trial, where I was looking forward to hearing the famous Mamachi[18] argue. Oh, how I suffered! The candidate was not on an ordinay stool, but on a stool-of-penitence like a condemned criminal. He had to sum up the arguments in forma ("formal arguments") of his four torturers, whose amusement it was to give their syllogisms endless majors. I saw that they were all in the wrong, for they were all absurd; but I congratulated them on my not being allowed to speak. Without being a theologian, I flattered myself that I should have annihilated all of them with common sense; but I was mistaken: common sense has no part at all in theology, and especially in speculative theology; and Stratico proved it to me theologically the same day in a house to which he took me to sup with him.

His brother, Professor of Mathematics at the University of Padua, arrived in Rome at this time, coming from Naples with the young Cavaliere Morosini,[19] whose tutor he was. He had broken a leg on one of the rides his wild pupil made him take; he had come to Rome to finish curing it. The company of these two brothers, the Counts Stratico, both men of honor, learned, and without prejudices, was my delight until, upon their departure, I too left Rome, where I had greatly enjoyed myself but had spent too much. I went to Florence after taking leave of all my acquaintances and especially of the Cardinal, who still hoped that Louis XV would recall him to Versailles.[20]

Such is the fate of all men, who, after having been Ministers at a great Court, find themselves in disfavor and compelled to live elsewhere, whether with no official position or with some commission which puts them in dependence upon the Ministers who have succeeded them. There is no wealth, no sort of philosophy, no image of peace, of tranquillity, or of any other happiness which can console them; they languish, they sigh, and they live only to hope that they will still be recalled. Indeed, by comparison we find in history that monarchs who have abdicated the throne are more numerous than Ministers who have voluntarily renounced their ministry. This observation has more often made me wish to be a minister than to be a king; one must believe that being a minister has inconceivable charms; and I am curious about them, for I cannot clearly picture what they may be.

I left Rome at the beginning of June 1771,[21] all alone in my carriage, with four post horses, well outfitted, in good health, and fully resolved to adopt a manner of life entirely different from the one I had so far pursued. Tired of the pleasures I had enjoyed for thirty years, yet glad that I had had them, I thought not of renouncing them altogether but of confining myself in future to entering into them lightly, forbidding myself any serious entanglements. In pursuit of this plan I was going to Florence without a single letter, determined to see no one and to devote myself entirely to study. Homer's Iliad, which since I had left London had delighted me for an hour or two each day in the original language, had made me want to translate it into Italian stanzas;[22] it seemed to me that its Italian translators had falsified it, except for Salvini,[23] who was so dry that no one could read him. I had scholiasts, I knew the merits of Pope;[24] but I felt that in his notes he could have said much more. Florence was the city in which I intended to occupy myself with this, living there in retirement from the world.

Other circumstances urged me to decide on this course.

I thought I had grown old. Forty-six years seemed to me a great age. There were times when I found the pleasures of love less intense, less seductive than I had imagined them before the act, and for eight years already my potency had been diminishing little by little. I found that a long bout was not followed by the soundest of sleep, and that my appetite at table, which before then love had sharpened, became less when I was in love, just as it did when I had enjoyed. In addition, I found that I no longer interested the fair sex at first sight, I had to talk, rivals were preferred to me, I was made to feel that it was already a favor if I was secretly allowed to share with another man; but I could no longer expect that sacrifices would be made for me. Finally, it angered me when I saw some young blockhead take no offense at the eagerness I showed for the object of his love, and when the object herself, to do me a favor, tried to make it appear that I was of no account. When I heard someone say of me, "He's a man getting on in years," I admitted it, but it was a truth which annoyed me. All this, at the times when, being alone, I reflected seriously on myself, convinced me that I must think of a dignified retirement. I even felt that I was forced into it, for I saw that I was on the verge of having nothing left to live on after my exchequer was exhausted. All my friends whose purses were open to me were dead. Signor Barbaro, who had died that year of consumption, had been able to leave me in his will no more than six wretched zecchini a month for life; and Signor Dandolo,[25] my only remaining friend, could give me only six more, and he was twenty years older than I. When I left Rome I had seven or eight hundred Roman scudi and my jewelry in the way of watches, snuffboxes, pretty rings of little value which did me more harm than good, for they made people think me rich, and ambition drove me to spend in a manner which proved that they were not wrong. My knowledge of this truth determined me to take the wise course of always appearing in Florence simply dressed and with no show of luxury. If I do that, I said to myself, when lack of money forces me to sell my possessions no one will be the wiser.

With this plan I got to Florence in less than two days, stopping nowhere and going to lodge at an inn of no reputation and sending my carriage to the post house, since the innkeeper, whose name was Gian Battista Allegranti, had no place to put it. It was on the next day that I went to have it put in a coach house.

Well enough lodged in a small room, finding the innkeeper modest and reasonable, and seeing only old and ugly women, I thought I could live there very peacefully and without any risk of making seductive acquaintances. The next morning I dressed in black,[26] and, wearing my sword, went to the Pitti Palace[27] to present myself to the Archduke–Grand Duke. He was Leopold,[28] who died the Emperor seven years ago. He gave audience to all who presented themselves, I thought I should go to him directly without troubling to go to Count Rosenberg's[29] first. Wanting to be left in peace in Tuscany, I thought that to guard myself against the misfortunes which result from the activities of spies and the natural suspiciousness of the police, I should present myself directly to their master. So I went to the anteroom and I wrote down my name after those of the others who were there waiting to be granted an audience. A Marchese Pazzi[30] who was one of them, and who had made my acquaintance in Rome at the house of a Marchesa[31]—I forget whether she was born a Frescobaldi of Florence or was the widow of a Marchese of that name—approached me with polite expressions of the pleasure it gave him to see me again in his country. He told me that he had traveled as far as Bologna with Signor XXX, who was returning to England with a young Roman wife who would eclipse all the beauties in London. He said that he mentioned him because, during the time he spent in Florence, he had talked about me a great deal, hoping to find me on his return to Rome. I thanked him for giving me this good news, since I was very much interested in the handsome couple's happiness.

I should have been sorry to find Armellina still in Florence, for, still loving her, I could not have seen her again possessed by another except in the greatest bitterness of soul.

My reader must have noticed that in the passage where I mentioned her marriage to the generous and charming Signor XXX, I did not dwell upon any of the circumstances which accompanied it. The reason is that I have never had the strength to write well about something the memory of which is painful to me. The intrigues of the Marquise d'Aout, the tears of Armellina, who was in love with the Florentine, and my word of honor which I had given her to make her his wife when I demanded her final favors on that humiliating condition both for her and for me, were the powerful motives which forced me to act against the interests of my heart. Repenting of my promise, I found myself reduced to offering Armellina my hand in the Superioress's presence, after I had made her perfectly certain that I was not married. Armellina refused my offer not in words but by tears; and one sentence from the Marquise d'Aout crowned my abasement. She asked me if I was in a position to give the excellent girl ten thousand Roman scudi.

This haughty question brought me back to reason, but with the utmost grief in my soul. I then wrote to the Superioress and to Armellina herself that I recognized how unjust I had been and I hoped that she would forgive me and lay my errors of judgment to the passion which filled my mind, wishing her all possible happiness with Signor XXX, who I admitted was a far better match for her and far worthier of her than I. The only favor I asked of her was to excuse me from being present at her wedding, and she granted me the favor, despite the insistence of the Marquise d'Aout, who, declaring all amorous feelings to be trifles, claimed that men of intelligence should shake off their influence. The Princess of Santa Croce was of the same opinion, but Cardinal de Bernis took my part, for he was more the philosopher than the Frenchman. The wedding was celebrated at the Marquise's, and Marcuccio was present at it with his wife, for Armellina had no other relatives in Rome.

It was with this grief that I went to Frascati, thinking that it would increase my enthusiasm for my ode on the Man-God; but my guardian Genius had prepared an entirely different kind of consolation for me.

Vice is not synonymous with crime, for one can be vicious without being a criminal. Such I was all my life long, and I even venture to say that I was often virtuous in the act of vice; for it is true that every vice cannot but be opposed to virtue, but it does not infringe on the universal harmony. My vices have never burdened anyone but myself, except the cases in which I have seduced; but seduction was never characteristic of me, for I have never seduced except unconsciously, being seduced myself.

The professional seducer, who deliberately sets out to accomplish it, is an abominable creature, inevitably the enemy of the object on which he has designs. He is a true criminal who, if he has the necessary qualities to seduce, renders himself unworthy of them by abusing them to make a woman wretched.

CHAPTER VI

La Denis. Medini. Zanovich. Zen. My enforced departure and my arrival in Bologna. General Albergati.

IN A few words I asked the young Grand Duke[1] for safe asylum so long as I should remain in his domains, and, anticipating the questions which I foresaw, I told him for what reason I could not return to Venice. I told him that for the necessaries of life I needed no one, and that I intended to spend my time in study. He replied that, if my conduct was good, the laws of his country were enough to assure me that I should enjoy all the peace I needed, but that he was glad that I had presented myself to him. He asked me what acquaintances I had in Florence, and I replied that I had frequented several distinguished houses ten years earlier, but that, wanting to live in strict retirement, I was not thinking of renewing my acquaintance with anyone.

This was the entire conversation I had with the sovereign. It was all that I thought I need do to guard me from any misfortunes. What had happened to me ten years before must have been forgotten, or else have no bearing, for the old government[2] had nothing in common with the new. I went to a bookseller's shop, where I bought the books I needed, and where a man with the air of good breeding, seeing that I was concerned with Greek literature, addressed me and interested me. I told him that I was working on a translation of the Iliad, and, confidence breeding confidence, he told me that he was compiling an anthology of Greek epigrams,[3] which he wanted to publish translated into Latin and Italian verse. When I expressed my interest in it, he asked me where I was lodging, and I gave him my address and my name, then asked him for his, intending to make the first call. Having gone to see him the next day, I had the honor of a visit from him on the day after that; we showed each other our work, and, exchanging our views, we became friends, and we remained so until my departure from Florence, without ever having to eat or drink together or even to go walking in each other's company. An intimacy between two men who love letters often excludes all the pleasures which they can enjoy only by stealing the time for them from literature. This worthy Florentine gentleman was named (or is named if he is still alive) Averado de' Medici.[4]

At the end of the month I resolved to leave Gian Battista Allegranti's. I was comfortable there, I enjoyed all the solitude and all the quiet I needed to study Homer, but I could bear it no longer. His niece Maddalena,[5] who, though very young, was well developed, pretty, and cleverness itself, drove me to distraction when I saw her, when she wished me good morning, when she sometimes came into my room to ask me if I needed anything. Her presence, her graceful ways seduced me. It was my fear of her seduction which saved her from mine. A few years later the girl became a celebrated musician.

So I left her uncle's inn, taking two rooms in the house of a townsman who had an ugly wife and no nieces. Maddalena Allegranti became the leading actress of all Europe and has always lived virtuously. She and her husband are now in the service of the Elector of Saxony.

In my new lodging I lived very peacefully for only three weeks. Count Stratico arrived in Florence with the Cavaliere Morosini,[6] his pupil, then eighteen years of age. I could not but go to see him. The leg he had broken had not yet regained its strength, he could not go out with his pupil, who, having all the vices of youth, kept him in continual fear of mishaps. He asked me to try to gain his good will and even, if necessary, to become his companion in his pleasures, so that he should not be left to go alone where he might encounter evil and dangerous company.

This interrupted my studies and played havoc with my determination to live quietly; goodheartedness forced me to take part in the young man's debauches. He was a frenzied libertine who cared nothing for learning, good society, or sensible people; riding until he galloped his horse to death without any fear of dying himself, drinking all kinds of wines, never satisfied until he had drunk away his reason, obtaining a brutish pleasure from loose women, whom he often beat, were his only passions. He had a local valet who was obliged by contract to supply him every day with some girl or woman who was not known as a public prostitute in the city of Florence. During the two months he spent in Tuscany I saved his life twenty times; I suffered under it, but my sense of decency forced me not to abandon him; as for the expense, I had to pretend to look the other way, for he always wanted to pay for everything, which often gave rise to violent quarrels between us, for, since he was paying, he insisted that I must drink as much as he did and keep up with him in the work of the flesh, either with the same girl or with another; but in these two respects I only half satisfied him. Even this did not happen until we began going to see the opera in Lucca,[7] where he often had two dancers go out with us, one of whom was of a caliber to please the most refined taste. The Cavaliere, who, as usual, had drunk too much, could do her only small justice; but I avenged her, and since she thought I was the sleeping young man's father, she told me that I ought to bring him up better.

After his departure, which took place when his tutor was entirely cured, I returned to my studies, but going every evening to sup at the dancer La Denis's,[8] who, after leaving the King of Prussia's service, and even the stage, had retired to Florence, where she is perhaps still living. She was about my age, but despite it she still inspired love. She did not look more than thirty, she had a childish charm which became her, the manners of good society, a gentle disposition, and she dressed very well. In addition she had a most comfortable apartment on the Piazza, above the best-known coffeehouse[9] in Florence, with a balcony where on hot nights one enjoyed a coolness which went to the soul. My reader may remember how I had become her lover in Berlin in 1764.[10] Now, meeting again in Florence, our old fires were rekindled.

The leaseholder of the house in which she lived was the Signora Bregonzi[11] whom I had met in Memel that same year, when I was on my way to Petersburg. La Bregonzi, who claimed that I had loved her twenty-five years before, often came up to see her tenant with the Marchese Capponi,[12] her former lover, a most agreeable and well-read man. Seeing that he enjoyed talking with me, I took the first step toward our becoming better acquainted by paying him a visit, which he returned, leaving a note because he had not found me at home. He introduced me to his family, he invited me to dinner, and it was the first day on which I dressed elegantly and appeared with my jewelry. At his house I made the acquaintance of Corilla's[13] famous lover, the Marchese Ginori,[14] who took me to a house in Florence where I could not escape my destiny. I fell in love with Signora XX,[15] a widow, still young, well read, rather well off, and acquainted with the manners of nations from having traveled and spent six months in Paris. This unhappy love made the last three months I spent in Florence a burden to me.

At this same time Count Medini arrived; it was the beginning of October, and, the Count having no money to pay his coachman, the latter had had him arrested. He had gone to lodge at an Irishman's who was poor though he had been a rogue all his life, and Medini wrote me begging me to come at once and deliver him from the constables who surrounded him in his own room and who wanted to take him to prison. He said that I did not need to pay, but only to stand surety for him, assuring me that I ran no risk, since he was certain that he would himself be able to pay what he owed in a few days.

The reader may remember the reasons I had for disliking the man, nevertheless I did not have the strength of mind not to go to his rescue, even resolved to stand surety for him as soon as he showed me that he would be able to pay within a few days. In any case, the amount, I thought, could not be large. I did not understand why the innkeeper himself did not do him the favor. But I saw and understood everything as soon as I entered his apartment.

He received me by running to me with open arms, begging me to forget all and help him out of his scrape. I saw three trunks, empty because all the clothes they contained were scattered about the room, his mistress, whom I knew and who had reasons not to like me, his sister, who was eleven or twelve years old, and his mother, who was cursing and swearing, calling Medini a scoundrel, and saying that she would go to the magistrate to protest, for it was not right that her dresses and her daughter's should be taken from her because of the debt he had incurred to his coachman. I at once asked the innkeeper why he did not stand surety when, having the persons and all their possessions in his house, he ran no risk. The innkeeper replied that everything I saw there was not enough to pay the coachman, and that he would no longer keep the new arrivals in his house. Surprised that all I saw there was not enough to cover the debt, I ask what it came to, and I see an exorbitant sum signed by Medini himself, who said nothing, leaving me to find out whatever I could. The amount came to two hundred and forty Roman scudi; but it no longer surprised me when he told me that the coachman had been in his employ for six weeks, having taken him from Rome to Leghorn, then to Pisa, then through the whole of Tuscany, paying his expenses everywhere. I told Medini that the coachman could not accept me as surety for such a large sum, but that even if he were fool enough to do so, I would never consent to act in that capacity. Medini then told me to go into another room with him, assuring me that he would persuade me. Two constables wanted to go in too, giving me as their reason that the debtor might escape by way of the windows; after I assured them that I would not let him leave they let us go in alone, and just then the coachman arrived and, coming to kiss my hand, said that if I would stand surety for the Count he would release him and would give me three months to pay. The coachman was the same one who had driven me from Siena with the English girl whom the French actor had seduced.[16]

Medini, a great talker, bold as brass, a liar, fertile in schemes, and never despairing of anything, thought he could persuade me by showing me a number of unsealed letters which introduced him in high-flown terms to the leading noble houses of Florence; I read them, but in none of them did I find an order to give him money; he told me that there was play in all these houses, and that, if he dealt, he was sure to win immense sums.

Another resource which he showed me, and which he kept in a large portfolio, was a quantity of notebooks in which he had three quarters of Voltaire's Henriade,[17] very well translated into Italian stanzas.[18] His stanzas and his lines were equal to Tasso's. He expected to finish his fine poem in Florence and to present it to the Grand Duke; he was sure he would not only receive a munificent present but would become his favorite. I laughed to myself, for I knew that the Grand Duke only pretended to love literature. An Abate Fontana,[19] a man of some talent, amused him with natural history; for the rest, the sovereign never read anything and preferred bad prose to the most beautiful poetry. What he loved was women and money.

After spending two very wearisome hours with this unfortunate exemplar of great intelligence but poor judgment, and having thoroughly regretted that I had gone to see him, I told him in the fewest possible words that I could not stand surety for him, and I was making for the door, when he had the audacity to take me by the collar.

Despair reduces men to such extremes. Medini, in a blind fury, took me by the collar without having a pistol in his hand, without remembering that I was probably a better man than he, that I had drawn blood from him for the second time in Naples, and that the constables, the innkeeper, and the servants were in the next room; but I was not so cowardly as to call out, I put my two hands around his neck to strangle him, being six inches taller than he, which meant that since I was holding him away he could not do the same to me. He let go of me at once, whereupon I took him by the collar, asking him if he had gone mad; I opened the door, and the constables, of whom there were four, came in. I told the coachman that I would stand surety for nothing, and, just as I was making to leave for good and all, Medini sprang to the door, saying that I must not abandon him. Since I persisted in forcing my way out, the constables tried to lay hands on him; the ensuing struggle held my attention. Medini, unarmed and in a dressing gown, began bestowing buffets, blows, and kicks on the four cowards, though each of them had a sword. This time it was I who, standing at the door, prevented the Irishman from leaving to summon help. The bloodstained Medini, for his nose was bleeding, with his shirt and his dressing gown torn, did not stop fighting the four henchmen until they let him alone. At that moment I inwardly pitied the poor wretch, and I esteemed him. In the silence which fell I asked the two servants in livery who were there why they had not lifted a finger to defend their master. One of them replied that he owed them six months' wages, and the other was base enough to say that he wanted to put him in prison on his own account. The scene touched me. Medini was trying to stanch his bleeding with cold water.

The coachman said quietly that if I did not vouch for the Count he would consider it a warning from me to have him put in prison.

"Give him two weeks' respite," I said, "and I will undertake in writing that if he absconds during that time I will pay you the entire amount."

After thinking for a moment the coachman said that he was satisfied, but that he would not pay a copper of the legal costs; after learning what the costs were, I decided to pay them, laughing at the constables who demanded damages for the beating he had given them. His servants then said that if I would not give them the same guarantee they would have their master arrested, and Medini told me to let them do as they pleased. After I wrote everything necessary to satisfy the coachman and paid the constables four or five scudi to leave, Medini said that he had something more to say to me, but without even answering I turned my back on him and went to dinner. Two hours later one of his two servants came to my lodging to tell me that if I would promise him six zecchini he would come to warn me as soon as he saw signs that his master intended to escape. I told him curtly that I had no need of his services, for I was sure that the Count would pay all his debts before the time ran out.

The next morning I informed the Count of the proposal his lackey had made to me. He replied in a long letter full of gratitude, appealing to my friendship to enable him to honor his obligations; but I did not answer him. His guardian angel sent someone to Florence to get him out of his difficulty. He was Premislas Zanovich,[20] who later became as famous as his brother,[21] who, after swindling the merchants of Amsterdam, took the title of Prince Scanderbeg. I will speak of him in the proper place. Both of these great swindlers came to bad ends.

Premislas Zanovich was then at the flourishing age of twenty-five years, the son of a gentleman who was a native of Budua,[22] the last city in the former Venetian Dalmatia on the border of Albania, now under the rule of the Turks; it is the ancient Epirus.[23] A young man of brilliant intelligence, after being brought up in Venice, completing his studies there, frequenting the best society, and acquiring a taste for the pleasures which one enjoys in that beautiful capital, he could not make up his mind to return to Budua with his father when the supreme guardians of law and order saw fit to order him to return to his native city, there peacefully to enjoy the great fortune he had made at cards in the capital, where he had spent fifteen years. Premislas could not conceive of himself as a citizen of Budua. He would not have known what to do there. He would have found nothing there but its coarse Slavonic inhabitants—dull or ferocious, having no more than the rudiments of reason, neither happy nor unhappy, as insusceptible to pain as to pleasure, with no knowledge of the arts or of letters, and indifferent to all the events which interest Europe and of which they hear only when some ship arrives from the east or the west with news. So Premislas, and his even more talented brother Stepan,[24] made up their minds to become adventurers, in perfect accord and always maintaining a correspondence, one of them going to the north, the other to the south of Europe, which they had determined to lay under contribution by their cleverness, making dupes wherever they could find victims ready to fall into the snares they would spread for them.

Premislas, whom I knew only from having seen him when he was a boy, and who even then had made himself a reputation from having duped the Cavaliere Morosini in Naples by persuading him to put up a surety of six thousand ducati for him, arrived in Florence in a fine carriage, with his mistress, two tall lackeys, and a valet who served as his courier. He took splendid lodgings, he engaged a fine coach, he took a box at the opera, he hired a cook, he gave his beautiful mistress a lady-in-waiting, and he went to the casino of the nobility, all alone, magnificently dressed and bejeweled. Everyone knew that he was Count Premislas Zanovich. The Florentines have what they call a casino of the nobility; any foreigner is free to go there without being introduced by anyone, but so much the worse for him if he does not have at least the outward appearance of belonging there, for the Florentines to the manner born leave him as solitary as if he were not there; he does not dare to come back a second time. The newspapers are there to be read, all kinds of games of chance are played, one can indulge in gallantry if one wishes to, and breakfasts and light refreshments are to be had if one pays for them. The Florentine ladies go there too.

Zanovich, all affability, did not wait to be spoken to before speaking, he bowed to everyone in turn, congratulating himself on having come to see them, talked of Naples, from which he had arrived, made comparisons flattering to those present, cleverly gave the conversation such a turn as to bring out his name, played for high stakes, lost good-humoredly, paid after pretending that it had slipped his mind, and pleased everyone. I learned all this the next morning at La Denis's from the intelligent Marchese Capponi. He told me that he had been asked if he knew me, and he had replied that when I left

Venice he was in school, but that he had often heard his father speak of me with great esteem; the Cavaliere Morosini was his intimate friend, and Count Medini, who had been in Florence for a week and who was mentioned to him, was also an acquaintance of his, and he spoke well of him. Asked by the Marchese if I knew him, I replied in the affirmative, not considering myself obliged to tell what I knew which could be harmful to him. La Denis having expressed a wish to make his acquaintance, the Cavaliere Puzzi[25] promised to present him to her.

This was done three or four days later. I saw a young man whose command of the situation made him certain to succeed in his undertakings. Though not handsome, and arresting attention neither by his face nor his figure, he had polished and easy manners, a talent for conversation, the ability to amuse, a gaiety which was infectious, he never talked about himself, and, asked about his native country, he gave a comic account of it, describing his estate, half of which was within Turkish territory, as a place which would make anyone who tried to live there die of melancholy. As soon as he learned who I was he complimented me in the highest terms, but without ever lapsing into flattery. In short, I saw in the young man a budding adventurer who, with discipline, could hope to achieve greatness; but I thought his luxury would prevent him from practicing it. I thought I saw in him my own portrait when I was fifteen years younger, and I pitied him, for I doubted if he had my resources.

Zanovich came to see me. He told me offhandedly that he had felt sorry for Medini and had paid all his debts. I praised him for doing so, and I thanked him. This piece of generosity led me to suppose that the two adventurers had laid some plots together. I congratulated them, but did not want to have any part in it. The next day I returned his call. I found him at table with his mistress, whom I had known in Naples, and whom I should have pretended not to know if she had not been the first to call me Don Giacomo, saying that she was delighted to see me again. I called her Donna Ippolita rather uncertainly, and she replied that I was not mistaken and that, though she had grown three inches taller, it was she. I had supped with her at the Crocelle[26] with Lord Baltimore. She was extremely pretty. Zanovich invited me to dinner on the next day but one, and I declined; but Donna Ippolita persuaded me to accept, saying that I should find company and that his cook had undertaken to do himself honor.

Somewhat curious to see who would make up the company at this dinner, and wanting to show Zanovich that I was not in a situation to become a drain on his purse, I dressed in my best for the second time in Florence. I found Medini with his mistress, two foreign ladies with their gentlemen, and a very well-dressed and rather handsome Venetian about thirty-five or forty years of age, whom I should never have recognized if Zanovich had not named him to me as Alvise Zen.[27] Since Zen was a patrician family, I thought it my duty to ask him by what titles I should address him, and he replied by those which one gives to an old friend, though I could not remember him for he was then only ten years of age. He said that he was the son of the Captain Zen whom I had known when I was imprisoned in the Fortress of Sant' Andrea.[28]

"That was twenty-eight years ago," I replied, "and I recognize you, Signore, even though you had not had the smallpox then."

I saw that he was annoyed to have to admit it, but it was entirely his own fault, for he had not needed to tell me that he had known me there and that the Adjutant was his father. He was the son of the natural son of a Venetian nobleman. As a boy he had been the greatest scamp in the Fortress, a rascal of the first water. He had just come from Madrid, where he had won a great deal of money, keeping the bank at faro in the house of the Venetian Ambassador, Marco Zen.[29] I was delighted to make his acquaintance. During dinner I perceived that he had neither culture nor the slightest education, he had neither the manners nor the speech of a gentleman, but he would not have given his talent for correcting the vagaries of fortune in exchange for all that. Medini and Zanovich were an entirely different sort. The two foreigners were the victims on whom they had designs; but I was not curious about the performance. When I saw the table made ready for play, and a pile of gold which Zanovich poured from a large purse, I took my leave.

This was the manner of my life during all of the seven months I stayed in Florence. After that dinner, I did not see Zanovich or Medini or Zen again, except by chance in public places. But here is what happened to me about the middle of December.

Lord Lincoln,[30] at the flourishing age of eighteen years, fell in love with a Venetian dancer named La Lamberti.[31] She was the daughter of the innkeeper in the Via del Carro[32] and admired by everyone. At the opera the young Englishman was seen to visit her every day in her dressing room, and all the connoisseurs observed with surprise that he did not go to her lodging, where he was sure to be well received not only as an Englishman but because of his youth and his wealth, for he was, I believe, the only son of the Duke of Newcastle.[33] The observation was not lost on Zanovich. Within a few days he became an intimate friend of La Lamberti's, then he struck up an acquaintance with Lord Lincoln, and took him to call on the beauty as a man of the world takes his friend to see his mistress.

In collusion with the rogue, La Lamberti was not chary of her favors to the young Englishman. She had him to supper every day with Zanovich and Zen, whom Zanovich had brought to her, apparently needing him either to make the bank at faro in visible gold, or to cheat, perhaps not being skillful enough to do it himself. In the beginning they let the young lord win a few hundred zecchini after supper, at which he got drunk, to wake the next morning in ecstasies to find himself as much in favor with Fortune as with Love and with the pleasant gentlemen who were his opponents at La Lamberti's, where he got drunk and nevertheless always won. But he stopped being in ecstasies when they finally cleaned him out. Zen won twelve thousand pounds sterling from him, and it was Zanovich who lent them to the young lord three or four hundred at a time, because he had promised his tutor that he would not play on his word. Zanovich, in luck, won from Zen all that His Lordship lost, and so it went on until they had done their worst to the Englishman and Zanovich reckoned up the amount that he had lent him. The Englishman arranged matters then and there. He promised to pay him three thousand guineas the next day, and he signed three bills of exchange for three thousand each, payable at intervals of two months and drawn on a banker in London. I learned the whole story of the transaction from His Lordship himself three months later in Bologna.

But at Florence his loss became the talk of the town the next day. The banker Sasso Sassi had paid Zanovich six thousand zecchini by His Lordship's order. Medini came to see me, furious that Zanovich had not cut him in, whereas I was congratulating myself on having had no part in the thing. But I was not a little surprised when three days later I saw in my room a man who, after asking my name and having heard me speak it, ordered me on behalf of the Grand Duke to leave Florence within three days and Tuscany within a week. I at once sent for the innkeeper to be a witness to the unjust order I was given.

It was December 28th; on exactly the same day three years before I had been ordered to leave Barcelona[34] within three days. I dress quickly and, since it was raining in torrents, I send for a carriage. I go to see the Auditor,[35] to obtain some light on my banishment, which seemed to me incomprehensible. The Auditor, being the Chief of Police, must know everything. I go there, I find the same man who had banished me from Florence eleven years before because of the Russian Ivanov's forged bill of exchange.[36] I ask him for what reason he had sent me an order to leave, and he replies coldly that such is the will of His Royal Highness.

"But," I replied, "His Royal Highness cannot so will without a reason, and I think I have a right to ask what it is."

"Then go and ask him, for I do not know it. The sovereign left yesterday for Pisa, and he will remain there three days; you are free to go there."

"And if I go, will he pay for my journey?"

"That I do not know, but you will see if he seems inclined to do you the favor."

"I will not go to Pisa, I will simply write to him, if you will promise to send my letter on to him."

"I will send it to him at once, for that is my duty."

"That is enough, you shall have it before noon, and before daybreak tomorrow I will be in the Pope's dominions."

"There is no need for you to make such haste."

"There is the greatest need, for I could not sleep in a country of despotism and violence where the law of nations is disregarded and where the sovereign breaks his word to me. I shall write him all this."

I leave, and at the foot of the stairs I come upon Medini, who tells me that he is going to ask the Auditor why he had sent him an order to leave. I reply with a laugh that I have just asked him the same question, and that he had told me to ask the reason of the Grand Duke, who was in Pisa.

"Then you have been ordered to leave too? What have you done?"

"Nothing."

"No more have I. We must go to Pisa."

"You may go there if it amuses you. For my part, I shall leave before nightfall."

I go home, and I at once send the innkeeper to the post house to inspect my carriage with a cartwright and to order four post horses to be ready for me at nightfall. After giving a few other little orders, I amused myself writing the Grand Duke this little letter, which I now translate word for word.

"Jupiter, Monseigneur, did not entrust you with the thunderbolt except on condition that you hurl it only at the guilty, and you are disobeying him by hurling it at my head. Seven months ago you promised me that I should enjoy perfect peace in your domains, provided that I did nothing to disturb the social order and would obey the laws; I have scrupulously kept that just condition; and consequently Your Royal Higness has broken your promise to me. I write to you, Monseigneur, only to let you know that I forgive you. In consequence of that forgiveness, I will complain to no one and will not accuse you of injustice either in writing or by word of mouth in any house in Bologna, where I shall be day after tomorrow. Indeed I should wish that I could forget a stain on my honor which is visited on me by your arbitrary will, were it not that I must remember it in order never again in my life to set foot on the soil of which God has made you the master. The Auditor has told me that I could go to speak to Your Royal Highness in Pisa; but I feared that my doing so would seem a piece of temerity to a prince who, according to common justice, must talk to men not after he condemns them but before. I am, etc. . . ."

After sealing my letter, I sent it to the Auditor, then I began packing.

Just as I was about to sit down at table, in comes Medini to inveigh against Zanovich and Zen. He complains that, whereas the misfortune which had befallen him was entirely because of the twelve thousand guineas they had won from the Englishman, they now refused him the mere hundred zecchini without which he could not leave. He told me that they had also received orders to leave, and that they were all going to Pisa, and he said he was surprised that I was not going there too. Laughing at his surprise, I asked him to leave, since I had to pack. As I expected, he thereupon asked me to lend him money; but I refused him so curtly that he left without pressing the matter.

After dinner I went to return some pieces from his anthology to Signor de' Medici and to embrace La Denis, who already knew everything and who could not conceive how the Grand Duke could confuse the innocent with the guilty as he was doing. She told me that La Lamberti the dancer had also been ordered to leave, together with a little hunchbacked Venetian Abate who knew La Lamberti but who had never gone to supper there. In short, the Grand Duke had made a clean sweep of all the Venetians who were then in Florence.

On my way home I met Lord Lincoln's tutor, whom I had known in Lausanne eleven years earlier.[37] I disdainfully told him what had happened to me because of his pupil's having let himself be cleaned out. The worthy Englishman told me that the Grand Duke had told the young Lord not to pay the amount he had lost, and that he had sent the Grand Duke word that not to pay would be dishonorable, and the more so since the money he owed was borrowed money, for he had never played on his word. It was true. It was also true that the lender and the gamester were in collusion, but His Lordship could not be sure of that.

My leaving Florence cured me of a very unhappy love which would have had disastrous consequences if I had stayed there longer. I have spared my reader the sad story of it, because it makes me sad every time I recall it. The widow whom I loved, and to whom I had been weak enough to declare myself, kept me tied to her triumphal chariot only to seize every opportunity to humiliate me; she despised me, and she wanted to convince me of it. I had persisted in continuing to see her, always thinking that I should succeed; but I saw, when forgetfulness had cured me, that I should have been wasting my time.

I left Florence poorer by about a hundred zecchini; I had run into no expense there, in short I had lived there like a wise man. I stopped at the first post house[38] in the Pope's dominions, and on the next to the last day of the year I arrived in Bologna, going to lodge at the "San Marco" inn.[39] I at once went to call on Count Marulli,[40] who was the Florentine Chargé d'Affaires, to beg him to write His Royal Highness that wherever I might be during the rest of my life I would praise his virtues.

He supposed I was not speaking as I thought, for he had received a letter informing him of the whole matter, but I told him that if he knew everything he would see that my obligations to His Royal Highness were vital. He assured me that he would write the Prince how I spoke of him.

On the first day of the year 1772 I went to present myself to Cardinal Branciforte;[41] he was the Legate. I had known him in Paris twenty years earlier when he was sent by Benedict XIV to convey the consecrated swaddling clothes to the newly born Duke of Burgundy. We had been together at Masonic lodges, and had enjoyed choice suppers with Don Francesco Sersale[42] and Count Ranucci[43] in company with pretty girls. The Cardinal was a wit and what is called a bon vivant.

"Oh, here you are!" he exclaimed as soon as he saw me; "I was expecting you."

"How could you have been expecting me, Monsignore, when nothing obliged me to choose Bologna in preference to some other city?"

"Bologna is better than any of them, and then too I was sure that you would think of me; but there is no need to tell people here the life we led when we were young. Count Marulli told me last evening that you pronounced the most flowery eulogy on the Grand Duke, and you are very right to do so. But speak to me in confidence, for nothing will go beyond this room. How many of you shared in the twelve thousand guineas?"

I thereupon told him the whole true story, ending by showing him the copy of the letter I had written the Grand Duke. He replied with a laugh that he was sorry I was innocent. When he learned that I was thinking of staying in Bologna for some months, he said that I could be sure of enjoying the greatest freedom there, and that as soon as the first gossip had died down he would give me proofs of his friendship.

After taking this precaution, I prepared to lead the same kind of life in Bologna as I had led in Florence. There is not a city in Italy in which one can live with greater freedom than in Bologna, where living is not expensive and where one can procure all the pleasures of life at little cost. In addition, the city is beautiful, and nearly all the streets are lined with arcades.[44] As for society, I did not trouble myself about it. I knew the Bolognese: the men of the nobility, ill-natured, proud, and violent; the rabble, the birichini[45] as they are called, even worse than the Neapolitan lazzaroni;[46] but the citizenry in general are decent people. All that, however, was of no concern to me. My plan was to devote myself to study, and to spend my time with few men of letters, whose acquaintance it is nowhere difficult to make. In Florence people are generally ignorant even of the Italian language, which is spoken well, but to be ignorant of its principles is as much as not to know it at all; and in Bologna everyone has some appreciation of letters. It is a university[47] at which there are three times as many professors as in all the others; but all with very small salaries; some have only fifty scudi a year; but they have many pupils and they live well. Printing is cheap there too, and though the Inquisition[48] exists, it is easy to deceive it.

On the fourth and fifth days of the year all the exiles from Florence arrived. La Lamberti stayed only one day and went on to Venice. Zanovich and Zen stayed five or six days, but apart, because they had quarreled over the division of the stolen money. Zanovich refused to make one of His Lordship's bills payable to Zen because he did not want to run the risk of becoming liable himself if the Englishman did not pay; he wanted to go to England, and he told Zen that he was free to go there too. They left for Milan without having made up their quarrel, the Milanese Government ordered them to leave, and I have never learned how they settled the matter between them; but I did learn that His Lordship's bills were punctually paid.

Medini had come to lodge at the inn in which I was staying, with his mistress, his little sister, his mother, and a servant, but still without money. He told me that the Grand Duke would give no one a hearing, that he had received another order to leave, so he had returned to Florence, where he had had to sell everything. He implored me to help him, but in vain. I never saw the man except in desperate straits for money, yet for all that never bringing himself to spend in moderation, and getting out of his scrapes per fas et nefas ("by fair means or foul"). The luck he had in Bologna was to find a Slavonian Franciscan friar named De Dominis[49] who was on his way to Rome to obtain a brief of laicization from the Pope. The friar fell in love with Medini's mistress, who made him pay very dearly, as was only right, for her favors. At the end of three weeks Medini left and went to Germany, where he printed his Henriade,[50] having found a good Maecenas in the Elector Palatine.[51] After that he wandered all over Europe for a dozen years, until at last he went to die in the prisons of London in the year 1788. I had always told him that he should avoid England, for he could be sure that if he went there he would die in prison. If he went there to prove the prophet false, he did ill, for the alternative was the cruel one of proving the prophecy true. He was a man who had birth, education, and intelligence, but who, being poor and loving luxury, could maintain himself only by gaming, correcting the vagaries of Fortune or incurring debts which, since he could not pay them, always obliged him to decamp. Yet he lived in this fashion for seventy years, and he might still be alive if he had heeded my advice. Eight years ago Count Tosio[52] told me that Medini, in prison in London, said to him that he would never have gone to England if I had not made him that cruel prophecy. That may be so; however, I shall never abstain from giving good advice to any poor wretch whom I see on the verge of ruin. On the same principle I told Cagliostro, twenty years ago in Venice, when the ignorant scoundrel was calling himself Count Pellegrini, that he should beware of setting foot in Rome. If he had believed me he would not have died in the Fortress of San Leo. The same sort of thing happened to me thirty years ago, when a wise man told me to beware of Spain; I went there nevertheless. And I came very near to perishing there.

A week or so after I arrived in Bologna I was in the shop of the bookseller Taruffi,[53] where I made the acquaintance of a young Abate with a squint whom in a quarter of an hour I found to be possessed of intelligence, learning, and taste. He made me a present of two pamphlets, the recent fruit of the genius of two young professors at the University. He said that reading them would make me laugh, and he was right. One of the pamphlets, which had been published the previous November, undertook to prove that women must be forgiven all the wrongs they did because they were the work of the womb, which made them act despite themselves. The second pamphlet was a critique of the first. The author claimed that the uterus was indeed an animal, but that it had no power over woman's reason, since anatomy had never found the slightest channel of communication between that organ, the matrix of the fetus, and the brain. I took it into my head to print a diatribe against the two pamphlets. I wrote it in three days; I sent it to Signor Dandolo in Venice to have five hundred copies of it printed for me immediately, which I received in Bologna and which I at once gave to a bookseller to sell on my account. The whole thing was done in two weeks; and at the expense of the two witty young doctors I made some thirty zecchini. The first of the two pamphlets was called L'Utero pensante[54] ("The Thinking Uterus"); the second, which criticized it, was in French and its title was La Force vitale[55] ("The Vital Force)." Mine was called Lana Caprina[56] ("Goat's Wool"). I made fun of the authors of the dissertations, and I treated the subject lightly, but by no means superficially. I had given it a preface in French, but using only idioms of the Parisian rabble, which made me unintelligible. The joke gained me many close acquaintances among the young men of the city. The squinting Abate, whose name was Zacchiroli,[57] introduced me to his friend the Abate Severini,[58] who in ten or twelve days became my friend too. He got me out of the inn, making me rent two fine rooms in the apartment of a retired virtuosa who was the widow of the tenor Carlani,[59] and had me make an arrangement at so much a month with a pastry cook for dinner and supper, which he sent me at my lodging. For lodging, food, and a servant I had to take, I did not spend as much as ten zecchini a month. The Abate Severini was the cause —and the very agreeable one—of my losing all interest in study and leaving the Iliad, to return to it when the fancy took me again.

The first thing he did was to introduce me to his family, and in a few days I became the most intimate of the friends of his household and the favorite of his sister, who, aged thirty years and rather ugly, but intelligent enough, declared herself proud of her spinsterhood and railed at marriage. During Lent the Abate introduced me to the cream of the singers and dancers in Bologna, which is the nursery of the breed, and all these heroines of the stage are very amenable and to be had very cheaply when they are in their native city. Severini introduced me to a new one every week; and, like a true friend, he kept watch over my finances. Being very poor, he never spent anything for the parties which he arranged for me and at which he was always present; but without him everything would have cost me twice as much.

A Bolognese nobleman, the Marchese Albergati Capacelli[60] by name, was getting himself talked about at the time; he had opened his theater to the public, and himself displayed great talent as an actor; he had made himself famous by obtaining the annulment of his marriage to a very noble lady whom he could not bear, in order to marry a dancer by whom he already had two sons. Despite that, he had had his marriage to his first wife annulled on the ground of impotence, and he had brazenly proved it by means of the tribunal whose use is still the barbarous and absurd custom in the greater part of Italy. Four expert, equitable, and uncorrupted judges subjected the naked Marchese to every experiment calculated to show if he was capable of erection, and the worthy Marchese, resisting their utmost diligence, remained perfectly flaccid. The marriage was pronounced null and void on the ground of "conditional" impotence, for he had had bastards.

But why the tribunal if his potency or impotence was to be pronounced "conditional"? He had only to swear that he could not be a man with the Marchesa, and the Marchesa had only to confirm it, and the tribunal would have been seen to be supererogatory, for, even if the stimuli had had power to resuscitate the Marchese, he could have said that he defied the Marchesa to apply them to him and obtain the same result.

So, the thing having made me curious to know the eccentric Marchese, I wrote Signor Dandolo to get me a letter to present to him as soon as I learned that he was back in Bologna, for at the time he was in Venice. A week or ten days later Signor Dandolo sends me a letter addressed to the Bolognese Marchese and written by a Venetian nobleman named Zaguri,[61] and he assures me that this patrician Zaguri was his intimate friend. Reading the letter, which was closed but not sealed, I am enchanted by its style; it was impossible to recommend a person unknown to the recommender more courteously or more ingeniously. I could not help writing Signor Zaguri a letter of thanks in which I told him that from that day I began to hope to be pardoned and to return to Venice for no other reason than to make the acquaintance of the noble patrician who had written such a fine letter in my honor. Signor Zaguri wrote me in reply that he considered my wish so flattering that he would at once set about procuring my return to Venice. After two and a half years of effort, and the help of others, he succeeded; but I shall speak of it when I come to that time.

Signor Albergati arrives in Bologna with his wife and his children; Severini informs me of it, the next day I go to his palace to send my letter in to him, and the porter tells me that His Excellency (for in Bologna they all assume the "Excellency") had gone to his country house,[62] where he would spend the whole of the spring. Two or three days later I have post horses harnessed to my carriage and I go to the gentleman's country house. It was a charming building on a hill. Finding no one at the door, I go upstairs and I enter a drawing room in which I see a gentleman and a pretty lady, about to sit down to dinner at a table to which the dishes had already been brought and which was laid for only two. After politely asking the gentleman if he was the person to whom the letter I had in my hand was addressed, and having heard him reply that he was, I give it to him. He reads the address, then he puts the letter in his pocket, saying that he will read it and thanking me for having taken the trouble to bring it to him. I instantly reply that it had been no trouble at all, but an honor, and that I begged him to do me that of reading the letter with which Signor Zaguri had honored me and for which I had asked because I wished to make myself known to him. At that the Marchese, with an air of smiling affability, told me that he never read letters when he was about to sit down at table, that he would read it after dinner, and that he would obey the orders which his friend Zaguri gave him.

This whole brief exchange having taken place standing, and everything having been said, I turn without bowing to him, I leave the room, I go downstairs, and I arrive still in time to keep the postilion from finishing unharnessing the horses. Promising him a double mancia (''tip''), I gaily tell him to take me to some village where, while waiting for his horses to eat their oats, I could eat something too. So saying, I get into my carriage, which was a very pretty and comfortable coupé. Just as the postilion was about to mount, a valet appears at the door and tells me that His Excellency asks me to come up. Silently pronouncing the stupid Marchese a very poor actor, I reach into my pocket, and I give him a card on which was my name and the place where I was lodging. I hand it to the valet, saying that it was what his master wanted. The valet goes upstairs with my card, and I tell the postilion to whip up.

In half an hour we stopped at a place where we refreshed ourselves, and then we went on to Bologna. The same day I informed Signor Zaguri of the incident, giving him all the details in a running narrative, and sending my letter to Signor Dandolo unsealed to convey to him. I ended my letter by asking the Venetian nobleman to write the Bolognese that, considering myself insulted, he must prepare to undergo all that my resentment would prompt me to do in accordance with the laws of honor.

I laughed a little the next day when, on my returning to my lodging to dine, my landlady handed me a card on which I read: "General the Marchese Albergati." She said that he had left it in person after learning that I was not at home.

I was very far from being satisfied; it was nothing but bravado. I awaited the result of the letter I had written Signor Zaguri in order to decide what sort of satisfaction I could demand. Just as I was studying the card which the ill-bred man had left for me, unable to conceive for what reason he assumed the title of General, in comes Severini, who tells me that three years earlier the King of Poland had accorded the Marchese the ribbon of the Order of St. Stanislas and the title of his Chamberlain;[63] Severini could not tell me if he was also a General in that monarch's service, but I instantly understood everything. According to the custom of the Polish Court, a Chamberlain had the title of Adjutant-General. So the Marchese called himself General. He was right, he was so, but General what? The adjective without the noun was used only to deceive readers, for the adjective by itself must seem the noun to all who did not know better. Delighted that I could avenge myself on my man by exposing his absurdity, I wrote a comic dialogue[64] and had it printed the next day. I made a present of it to the bookseller, and in three or four days he sold all the copies of it at a baiocco[65] apiece.

CHAPTER VII

The Dowager Electress of Saxony and Farinelli. La Sclopitz. Nina. The midwife. La Soavi. The Abate Bollini. La Viscioletta. The seamstress. Sad pleasure of a revenge. Severini goes to Naples. My departure. The Marchese Mosca at Pesaro.

ANY WRITER who attacks a proud man by comico-satirical compositions is almost sure to triumph, for the laughers are at once on his side. In my dialogue I asked if a Field Marshal could call himself simply a Marshal, and a Lieutenant-Colonel a Colonel. I asked if a man who preferred to the titles of nobility which birth confers titles of honor bought for cash could be considered wise. The Marchese thought it best to ignore my dialogue, and the thing was over; but from then on the whole city never called him anything but the General. I saw over the door of his palace the arms of the Republic of Poland,[1] which greatly amused Count Mischinski,[2] Ambassador from the King of Poland to the Court of Berlin, who arrived in Bologna at this time, coming from the baths at Pisa. I persuaded him to leave a visiting card showing his title at his door, and Albergati returned the courtesy, but for once I saw no title of General on his card.

The Dowager Electress of Saxony[3] came to Bologna soon afterward, and I paid my court to her. She had come only to see the famous castrato Farinelli,[4] who, after leaving the Court of Madrid a rich man, was living quietly in that city. He gave her a magnificent collation, and an air of his composition which he sang to his own accompaniment on the harpsichord. The princess, who was an enthusiastic musician, embraced Farinelli and told him that now at last she could die content. Farinelli, who was known as the Cavaliere Don Carlo Broschi, had so to speak reigned in Spain. The Parmesan Queen,[5] the wife of Philip V, had fomented intrigues which forced Broschi to leave the Court after the disgrace of the Marquis of La Ensenada.[6] The Electress, looking at the standing portrait of the Queen painted by Amigoni,[7] praised her and spoke to the castrato about something which must have taken place during the reign of Ferdinand VI.[8] In answer the musical hero, shedding tears which he quickly wiped away, said that Queen Barbara[9] was as good as Elizabeth of Parma was bad. When I saw him in Bologna, Broschi might have been seventy years of age. He was extremely rich, and in very good health; despite that, he was unhappy because, having nothing to do, he was bored, and he wept every time he remembered Spain. Ambition is far more powerful than avarice. In addition Farinelli was unhappy for another reason, which was, I have been told, the cause of his death. He had a nephew[10] who was to inherit all his wealth. He had him marry a young lady of a noble Tuscan family,[11] thinking thus to attain the happiness of seeing himself the head of a family which, because of its wealth, would easily be ennobled by the second generation at the latest, and it might well have happened; but this was precisely the cause of his unhappiness. Poor old Farinelli fell in love with his nephew's wife, and, what is worse, became jealous, and, what is still worse, hateful to his niece, who could not imagine how an old animal of his species could flatter himself that she would prefer him to her husband, who was a man like other men and to whom she owed her affection by all human and divine laws. Farinelli, angry with the young woman, who refused him concessions which, after all, amounted to nothing, for they could not have any serious consequences, had sent his nephew traveling, and he kept his niece in his house as if in prison, having taken away the diamonds he had given her, and never going out so that he should never lose sight of her. A eunuch in love with a woman who detests him becomes a tiger.

Lord Lincoln[12] having come to Bologna with a letter of recommendation to the Cardinal-Legate, he gave a dinner for him and invited me to it. He had the pleasure of convincing himself that I had never been with his Lordship, and hence that the Grand Duke had committed a crying injustice in banishing me. It was on that day that I learned from his own lips how the snare had been set for him, but he never told me that he had been cheated. He assured me that it was he himself who had wanted to stop playing. It is easy to cheat an Englishman; but it is very difficult to make him admit that he has been cheated. The young Lord died of debauchery in London three or four years later. At this same time I also saw in Bologna the Englishman Aston, with the beautiful Sclopis, sister of the charming Callimena.[13] La Sclopis was by far the more beautiful. She had two small children with her, fathered by Aston and pretty as angels. Charmed by all that I said to her about her sister, she understood that I had loved her, and she told me she was sure she would go to sing in Florence during the Carnival of the year 1773. I found her in Venice in 1776, and I will speak of her when I come to that time.[14]

La Nina, the fatal Nina Bergonzi,[15] who had made Count Ricla lose his reason and who had been the cause of all the misfortunes which had befallen me in Barcelona, had been in Bologna since the beginning of Lent. She had rented a house, she had an open letter for a banker who was ordered to supply her with all the money for which she should ask; she had carriages, horses, and many servants; and, having declared that she was with child by the Captain-General of the Kingdom of Barcelona, she demanded that the good Bolognese pay her the honors due to a queen who, for her convenience, had come to be brought to bed in their city. She had a particular recommendation to the Cardinal-Legate, who often went in the greatest incognito to visit her, and the time of her lying-in drawing near, a confidential secretary of Count Ricla named Don Martino[16] had arrived from Barcelona with a power of attorney from the Spanish madman who was the vixen's dupe authorizing him to have the infant baptized and recognized as a natural child of the Count's. Nina made a spectacle of her pregnancy. She showed herself at the theater and in the public promenades with an enormously big belly, insisting on being supported on either side by the intrepid Bolognese noblemen who paid her court and to whom she often said that she would always receive them but that they must be on their guard, for she did not answer for the tolerance of her lover, who might have them murdered; and she shamelessly told them what had happened to me in Barcelona, not knowing that I was in Bologna. She expressed great surprise when Count Zini,[17] who knew me, told her that I was there, and it was Count Zini who, having found me at the evening promenade on La Montagnola,[18] saw fit to approach me and learn from my own lips the whole of the unhapppy story.

In my turn I saw fit to tell him that it was a fairy tale, which Nina, whom I did not know, had invented for him, wanting to see if he had the courage to expose his life to a great risk in order to give her a great proof of his love. I did not deny.the fact to the Cardinal-Legate when he told me the same story; I astonished him when I recounted all of the shameless vixen's extravagances to him, and when I told him that she was her sister's daughter; but I could not keep him from laughing when I told him that I did not believe she was with child.

"What possible reason," he said, "can you have for not believing she is with child? Nothing could be easier or more natural. She may not be with child by the Count, but she is with child, and even on the verge of being brought to bed. It cannot be untrue, for if she is with child she needs must lie in. Besides, I do not see what reason she can have had to pretend she is with child."

"Your Eminence does not know the woman's infamous character; she wants to make herself famous by dishonoring Count Ricla, who was a paragon of virtue until he met the monster."

Eight hours later, an hour after midnight, I hear a great noise in the street, I look out of my window, and I see a woman, naked to the waist, mounted astride an ass, followed by the executioner, who was whipping her, surrounded by constables, and followed by all the birichini of Bologna, who were enjoying the show and hooting incessantly. Just then Severini comes upstairs and tells me that the woman who was being treated in this fashion is the most celebrated midwife in Bologna, that her punishment was by order of the Cardinal-Archbishop,[19] that the reason for it was not yet known, but that it would be known very soon. It could only be for some great crime. He said that she was the midwife who two days earlier had delivered La Nina, who had given birth to a fine dead boy. Here is the story, exactly as it was known to the whole city the next day.

A poor woman went to complain to the Archbishop that the midwife Teresa, known as Teresaccia, had four or five days earlier led her astray by promising her twenty zecchini. She had persuaded her to sell her a fine boy whom she had borne two weeks earlier. The woman, who had not received the twenty zecchini, and who was in despair over having caused the death of her baby, demanded justice from the Archbishop, undertaking to prove that her son was the dead child whom Nina was said to have borne. The Archbishop ordered his chancellor to proceed at once and in the greatest secrecy to make all the investigations necessary to substantiate the allegation, and as soon as he was sure of the scandalous crime he had the midwife summarily sentenced and punished, in accordance with the Valerian law,[20] Punire et deinde scribere ("First punish, then write"). A week later Don Martino left for Barcelona, but the shameless Nina stuck to her guns, even ordering her servants' red cockades[21] made twice as big, and having the gall to tell those who called on her that Spain would avenge her for the calumny by which the Cardinal-Archbishop had dishonored her; and, to play her bad role well, she remained in Bologna for six weeks after her pretended lying-in; but the Cardinal-Legate, who felt ashamed to have protected her, secretly took every step to force her to leave. However, Count Ricla settled a considerable annual income on her, on condition that she never again dare appear in his presence in Barcelona. Some months later he was summoned to the Court, to assume the post of Minister of War, and a year later he died.[22] Nina died two years after him, in poverty and of the pox. Her sister herself told me in Venice the whole wretched story of her last two years, which would sadden my reader and which I spare him.

The infamous midwife did not lack protectors. A pamphlet came out, printed no one knew where, in which the unknown author proved that the Cardinal-Archbishop should be disciplined for having sentenced a citizen to the most harrowing of punishments, in contravention of all established legal procedures. His conclusion was that the midwife was unjustly punished even though she was guilty, and so in her turn she could appeal to Rome, demanding the fullest compensation from the Archbishop.

The Archbishop circulated a reply through Bologna, in which he said that the midwife, whom he had punished only by whipping, would have paid the extreme penalty three times if the honor of three illustrious Bolognese families had not prevented him from publishing her crimes, all attested by official documents preserved in his chancellery. They concerned forced abortions, from which the guilty mothers had died, living children substituted for infants stillborn, and a boy substituted for a girl, the said boy being now unjustly in possession of the family's entire estate. This reply silenced all the infamous creature's protectors, for several young noblemen whose mothers had been attended in childbed by the guilty midwife feared the disclosure of secrets which would have proved them bastards.

During this time I saw the dancer La Marcucci,[23] who had been banished from Spain a little time before I left for the same reason which had brought about the banishment of La Pelliccia.[24] The latter had gone to settle in Rome, La Marcucci went to live in opulence in her native Lucca.

The Bolognese dancer Soavi,[25] whom I had known in Parma when I was living there happily with Henriette, then in Paris, where she was dancing at the Opéra and being kept by a Russian nobleman, then in Venice as the mistress Signor Marcello,[26] came to settle in Bologna at this time with her eleven-year-old daughter, a love-child, whom she had had by Monsieur de Marigni,[27] Musketeer. The girl, whom she had named Adelaide,[28] was a perfect beauty, and to beauty she added all the graces, the sweetness, and the talents which the choicest education can confer. La Soavi came to Bologna, where, finding her husband [29] whom she had not seen for fifteen years, she introduced this perfect treasure to him.

"She is your daughter," she said.

"She is pretty, my dear wife, but she cannot be mine."

"She is yours, you silly, as soon as I give her to you. Let me tell you that she has an income of two thousand scudi, and that I shall be her only cashier until the time comes when I marry her to a dancer, for I want her to learn the whole art of the dance and to shine on the stage. On holidays you shall take her to the promenade."

"And if I am asked who she is?"

"You will say she is your daughter, and that you are sure of it because the person who gave her to you is your own wife."

"I don't understand that."

"Because, my dear friend, having never traveled, you know nothing."

Having been present at this dialogue, which made me laugh heartily, I now amuse myself by writing it. Enchanted to see so rare a jewel, I at once offered my services to increase her talents; but her mother replied that she was afraid I would give her too many. Adelaide had become the wonder of Bologna. A year after my departure Count Du Barry,[30] brother-in-law of the famous Madame Du Barry, the last mistress of the last King of France,[31] now become infamous, passing through Bologna fell so in love with Adelaide that her mother, fearing that he would carry her off, sent her into hiding. Du Barry wanted to give her a hundred thousand écus for her. The mother refused them. Five years later I saw her dance in Venice. When I went to congratulate her, the charming Adelaide found an opportunity to tell me that her mother, who had brought her into the world, also wanted to send her out of it, for she felt that the profession of a dancer was killing her. And in fact she lasted only six or seven years more. All her money coming from an annuity, her mother was left in poverty; she would have lost nothing if she had invested her capital in an annuity with a reversion to her survivor on her death.

At this time I saw in Bologna the famous Affisio,[32] who, having been dismissed from the Imperial service, had turned opera impresario. Going steadily from bad to worse, five or six years later he was guilty of forgeries for which he was sentenced to the galleys, where he died six or seven years ago.

In Bologna I was struck by seeing another man descended from a great family and born to be rich. He was Count Filomarino.[33] I found him destitute and crippled in every limb by venereal disease. I often went to see him, both to leave him a few paoli for food and to study the human heart in the remarks he made to me with his malevolent tongue, the only one of his members of which the pestilential disease had left him the use. I always found him the same scoundrel and slanderer, and angry to have been reduced to a state which prevented him from going to Naples to massacre his relatives, all decent people, but according to him the basest of mortals.

The dancer Sabbatini,[34] having returned to Bologna rich enough to rest on her laurels, gave all her money to the Professor of Anatomy and became his wife. I found her with her sister, who had no talent and was not rich, but who had prepossessing ways. I noticed an Abate whose modesty seemed to me more unusual than his pretty face, who attracted the sister's entire attention; he seemed to respond to it only from gratitude. When I addressed him on I forget what subject, he replied very sensibly, but with the tone of uncertainty which always pleases. Having taken leave of the company at the same time, we walked away together at random, and, merely from politeness, we told each other where we were from and what small concerns we had in Bologna. We parted, promising to call on each other.

Between twenty-four and twenty-six years of age, he had nothing of the Abate except the dress. He was the only son of a noble family of Novara,[35] who were not rich. With his small income, he lived in Bologna more comfortably than in Novara, where living was dearer, and where everything was a burden to him; his parents interfered with him, friendships had no substance, and ignorance was general. He could not bear being there, he seemed not to be free, though, having no decided inclinations, he made almost no use of what a man of strong passions calls freedom. The Abate Bollini (such was his name) was a man of peaceable disposition who loved nothing but quiet; other things he enjoyed, but they were not of great moment to him. He liked men of letters better than letters; he was satisfied not to be thought stupid, not to be set down as ignorant by the learned men he sometimes frequented because he did nothing but listen to them. He was sober by nature, a good Christian by education, not at all a freethinker, for he never reasoned about religion; nothing shocked him; rather kindly than inclined to criticism, which is almost always malevolent, he seldom praised, but he never blamed. To womankind he was almost indifferent. He avoided ugly women and those who tried to dazzle by their wit; those who fell in love with him and made advances, he did not leave to languish; as soon as he found some merit in them he acceded to their wishes from gratitude, never from love, having, in any case, so little temperament that he thought women apt rather to diminish the happiness of life than to increase it.

This last aspect of his character was the one which interested me, and so much so that, after we had been acquainted for two or three weeks, I made bold to ask him how he could reconcile it with his obvious attachment to Signorina Brigitta Sabbatini. He went to sup with her every day, for she did not lodge with her sister, and she came to breakfast with him every morning. I kept seeing her there, for she would arrive while I was there myself. She always looked content, and her behavior was unexceptionable, but I saw love in her eyes and in her every movement. In the Abate I found only the extreme complaisance which is never without a certain constraint, which, for all the Abate's politeness, did not escape me. She was at least ten years older than he, and she treated me in the most obliging manner possible. She did not want to make me fall in love with her, but to convince me that the Abate was happy in the possession of her heart and that she well deserved the most perfect return.

So when, in the state of sincerity which a bottle of good wine after dinner inspires between two friends, I questioned the Abate Bollini about the nature and the quality of his connection with Brigitta, he smiled, he sighed, he blushed, he looked down, and he told me that the connection was the misfortune of his life.

"The misfortune of your life? Does she make you sigh in vain? You must recover your happiness by leaving her."

"I cannot sigh in vain, for I am not in love with her. On the contrary, it is she who, declaring that she is in love with me, and constantly giving me the most convincing proofs of it, is threatening my freedom. She wants me to marry her, I promised her I would from a feeling of pity, and she is in a hurry; she torments me every evening, she urges me, she cries, she demands that I keep a promise which I made her only to calm her despair, and she rends my soul every day by saying that I am deceiving her. You cannot but see all the misery of my situation."

"Have you contracted obligations to her?"

"None at all. She is poor, she has only thirty baiocchi a day, which her sister allows her and which she will no longer allow her after she marries."

"Perhaps you have given her a child."

"I have been very careful not to. She loathes my precautions. She claims they are clear proofs that I am not thinking of marrying her, and at that, not knowing what to say, I say nothing or beat around the bush."

"But you mean to marry her one day or another."

"I feel, my dear friend, that I shall never in my life bring myself to it. The marriage would make me at least four times poorer, and I should make a laughingstock of myself in Novara if I married her and brought her there, for, though she is respectable, not ugly, and has a sufficiently good manner, she is not a woman to be my wife, for she has neither wealth nor birth, and in Novara at least the first is demanded."

"As a man of honor even more than as a man of good sense, you must break it off, you must leave her today rather than tomorrow."

"I see that, and since I can only do it by moral force, I tell you I have not enough of that to do it. If I did not go to sup with her this evening she would instantly come to my lodging to find out what has happened to me. You can understand that I can neither have her turned away from my door nor send her away myself."

"That I see, but you must see too that you cannot live in this state of turmoil. You must come to a decision, you must cut this knot with Alexander's sword.[36] You must say nothing to her, and go to live in some other city, where she will not be fool enough, I imagine, to go looking for you."

"That would be the best solution, but running away is very difficult."

"Difficult? You are laughing at me. Do as I tell you, and I will arrange for you to go as easily as you please. She will not know you are gone until, not seeing you at supper, she will hurry to your lodging and not find you."

"I will do whatever you tell me, and you will be rendering me a service which I will never forget. Her grief will drive her mad."

"Come now! I begin by forbidding you to think of her grief. That is all you need to do; leave everything else to me. Do you want to go tomorrow? Have you debts? Do you need money?"

"I have enough money, and I have no debts; but the thought of leaving tomorrow makes me laugh. I need at least three days. I have to get my letters from the post tomorrow, and I have to write home to say where I will be."

"I will see to getting your letters from the post, and to sending them to you where I send you, which you will know when you are setting off. Trust in me. I will send you where you will be very comfortable. The only preparation you have to make is to leave your trunk with your landlord, ordering him to deliver it to no one but me."

"I will see to that. So you want me to leave without my trunk, and you won't tell me today where I shall be going. It's odd. But I'll do it."

"Don't fail to come to dine with me on all these three days, and above all tell no one that you are leaving."

He had become radiant. I embraced him, thanking him for having confided in me; I thought he had become a different man on the instant.

Congratulating myself on having done this work of charity, and laughing at the fury which poor Brigitta would vent on me after her lover's flight, I wrote Signor Dandolo[37] that in five or six days he would see a Novarese Abate who would give him a letter from me; I asked him to find him a decent room, with board, but at the lowest price possible, for, though a nobleman and well mannered, he was not rich. I wrote the other letter which the Abate would deliver to him personally. The next day the Abate told me that Brigitta was very far from guessing his intention, for she had found him most amorous. She had all of his linen, but he hoped to get the greater part of it back on some pretext.

On the day set for his departure he came to my lodging at the hour I had appointed the previous day, bringing in a night bag whatever he might need during the four days he would be without his trunk. I took him to Modena by post, and, after we had dined, I gave him my letter addressed to Signor Dandolo, to whom I promised him I would send his trunk the next day. He was most agreeably surprised when he learned that he was to stay in Venice, which he very much wanted to see, and when I assured him that the gentleman to whom I was sending him would arrange for him to live as he had been living in Bologna. After seeing him leave for Finale,[38] I returned to Bologna, where I at once obtained the Abate's trunk from his landlord, having it taken to the post addressed to Signor Dandolo in Venice.

The next day, as I expected, I saw before me the poor abandoned Brigitta dissolved in tears. It was the moment to treat her with pity. I should have been cruel if I had pretended not to know the cause of her despair. I preached her a very long sermon intended to persuade her that, so far as she was concerned, I could not but feel sorry for her, but that I could not abandon my friend, who was on the verge of ruining himself by marrying her. She fell on her knees before me at the end of my discourse, begging me to make him come back, promising that she would say no more to him of marriage, and to calm her I said that I would try to persuade him to do so. I told her that he had gone to live in Venice, and, as was to be expected, she did not believe me. There are occasions when a man who is sure he will not be believed should tell the truth. It is a kind of lie which cannot but be approved by the strictest moralists. Twenty-seven months later I saw my dear Abate Bollini in my native city. I shall speak of him when I come to that time.

After my friend's departure I made the acquaintance of the beautiful Viscioletta,[39] and I fell so much in love with her that, not wanting to take the long way round, I had to resolve to buy the enjoyment of her. Try as I would, women no longer fell in love with me; I had to make up my mind to renounce love, or to submit to paying for it, and nature forced me to accept the latter course, which love of life finally makes me reject today. The sad victory I have won obliges me, at the end of my career, to forgive all my successors and to laugh at all those who ask me for advice, for I see beforehand that most of them have no intention of following it. This foresight results in my giving it to them with more pleasure than I should feel if I were sure they would follow it, for man is an animal who can only be taught by cruel experience. Because of this law, humanity will always exist in disorder and ignorance, for wise men make up at most a hundredth part of it.

La Viscioletta, whom I went to see every day, and to whom I had been introduced by the Quaranta Davia,[40] who was reputed to be a little mad, treated me as the Florentine widow had done; but the widow demanded a respect which I did not think I owed to La Viscioletta, who was a professional courtesan under the guise of a virtuosa. In three weeks I had obtained nothing, and I was laughingly repulsed when I tried to steal anything more. Her secret lover was Monsignor Buoncompagni,[41] the Vice-Legate. The whole city knew it, despite which he visited her in secret, for his position did not allow him to court her publicly. La Viscioletta herself made no mystery of it.

At this same time I put up my coupé for sale. I needed money, and I preferred selling my carriage to selling some other possession which I liked better. I set the price of it at three hundred and fifty Roman scudi. The proprietor of the stable where it was came to tell me that the Vice-Legate offered me three hundred scudi for it; I took real pleasure in thwarting the wish of a prelate who possessed the object of my vain desires. I replied that I did not care to haggle and that I had already announced the price.

Having gone to the stable at noon to make certain that my carriage was in good condition, I found there the Vice-Legate, who knew me from having seen me at the Cardinal's and who must have known very well that I called on his beauty. He said to me in an insolent tone that my carriage was not worth more than three hundred scudi, that he knew more about it than I did, and that I ought to seize the opportunity to get rid of it, because it was too fine for me.

The originality of these expressions made it necessary for me to be silent, for I feared that too acid a reply might anger him. I left him there, saying that I would not lower the price by a copper.

The next day La Viscioletta wrote me that my giving my carriage to the Vice-Legate at the price he had offered would be doing her a great favor, for she was sure he would make her a present of it. I replied that I would go to speak with her that afternoon, and that it would depend on her to persuade me to do whatever she wanted. I went there, and after a short but forceful conversation, she surrendered to me. I wrote her a note in which I sold her my carriage for the sum of three hundred Roman scudi. She had the carriage the next day, and I the money and the pleasure of having given the prelate good reason to guess that I had found a way to avenge myself for his stupid pride.

About this time Severini, who was unemployed, managed to secure a place as tutor to a young nobleman of an illustrious Neapolitan family, and he left Bologna as soon as he received money for the journey.

After my friend left, I began to think of leaving that beautiful city too. Signor Zaguri, who had maintained an interesting correspondence with me from the time of the affair of the Marchese Albergati, thought of obtaining permission for me to return to my native country by joining with Signor Dandolo, who asked nothing better. He told me that to obtain a pardon I should go to live as near as I could to the Venetian State, to make it easy for the Tribunal of the State Inquisitors to observe my good behavior. Signor Zulian,[42] brother of the Duchess of Fiano,[43] who also wanted to see me back in Venice, was of the same opinion and promised to use all his influence in favor of the plan.

So, determined to change my place of refuge, and having to choose one near the borders of the Republic, I did not care for either Mantua or Ferrara. I decided on

Trieste, where Signor Zaguri told me he had an intimate friend to whom he would recommend me. But since I could not go to Trieste by land without passing through the State of Venice, I thought of going there by sea. I chose Ancona, from which ships left for Trieste every day. Having to pass through Pesaro, I asked for a letter to someone who could introduce me to the Marchese Mosca,[44] a man of letters whose acquaintance I wanted to make, and Signor Zaguri procured one for me himself. The Marchese had just got himself much talked about because of a treatise on almsgiving which he had published and which the Roman Curia had caused to be put on the Index. Both devout and learned, he was imbued with the doctrine of St. Augustine, which, carried to the extreme, is that of the so-called Jansenists.[45]

I left Bologna with regret, for I had spent eight delicious months there. On the next day but one I arrived in Pesaro alone, in perfect health, and reasonably well provided for.

Having sent my letter in to the Marchese, I saw him at my lodging the same day, delighted with the letter I had brought him. He said that his house would always be open to me, and that he would leave me in his wife the Marchesa's hands to be introduced to all the nobility of the city and shown everything worth seeing there. He ended his short visit by inviting me to dine at his house the next day with his whole family, where I should, he said, find myself the only stranger; but that did not prevent him from inviting me to spend the morning in his library, where we would drink a cup of chocolate together. I went there, and I had the pleasure of seeing an immense collection of scholiasts on all the known Latin poets from even before Ennius[46] down to the twelfth century. He had had all their productions carefully and accurately printed, in his house and at his expense, in four large folio volumes; but the edition was not beautiful, and I ventured to tell him so. He admitted it. This want of beauty, which had saved him twenty thousand scudi, had prevented him from gaining fifty thousand. He presented me with a copy of it, which he sent to my inn together with a large folio the title of which was Marmora Pisaurentia,[47] and which I did not have time to examine. I should have learned everything about the town of Pesaro.

The great pleasure I had was at table, where I sat next to his wife, in whom I discovered a great deal of merit, and opposite to his five children, three girls and two boys, all pretty and well brought up. They interested me infinitely, yet I can give my readers no account of them. I never inquired what became of them.

The Marchesa Mosca was the perfect pattern of a woman of the world, and her husband cared for nothing but literature; hence they were not in agreement, and the harmony of the household suffered; but a stranger was not aware of it. If I had not been told as much, I should not have known it. "All families," a wise man said to me fifty years ago, "are privately at odds over some comedy which mars the peace of the household. It is the part of the head of the family, in his prudence, to see that the comedy does not become public, for one must not give occasion for laughter and for the malicious comments and catcalls of the public, which is always spiteful and ignorant." Signora Mosca-Barzi devoted her entire attention to me during all the five days I spent in Pesaro. She took me in her carriage to see all the country estates, and in the evening she presented me at all the entertainments of the nobility.

The Marchese Mosca might then have been fifty years of age. Cold by nature, his only passion was study and his morals were pure. He had founded an academy, of which he had reserved the presidency to himself. His device was a fly, in allusion to his family name of Mosca, with the two words deme ce ("take away c"). Removing the letter c, Musca became Musa.[48] The worthy nobleman's one fault was what the monks considered his finest quality. He was too much a Christian. This "too much" of religion could not but make him go beyond the bounds where nequit consistere rectum ("what is fitting cannot exist").[49] But is there less harm in going beyond than in falling short? That is a question on which I will never pronounce. Horace said: Nulla est mihi religio ("I have no religion"),[50] and he began an ode in which he condemns the philosophy which keeps him from worshiping the gods.[51] Every "too much" is bad.

I left Pesaro enchanted by the fine company I had seen there, and sorry not to have met the Marchese's brother,[52] whom everyone praised to me.

CHAPTER VIII

I take a traveling companion in the person of a Jew from Ancona named Mordecai, who persuades me to lodge in his house. I fall in love with his daughter Leah. After a stay of six weeks, I go to Trieste.

I DID not examine the Marchese Mosca-Barzi's collection of all the Latin poets until I was at leisure in Ancona. I found neither the Priapeia[1] nor the Fescennina[2] nor several other fragments of the ancient poets which exist in manuscript in several libraries. It was a work which showed that the man who had produced it loved literature but not that he was learned in it, for all that he had done himself was to arrange the authors' works in chronological order. I should have liked to find it supplied with notes and often with glosses. In addition, as a product of the printing press it was undistinguished, the type was ugly, the margins scant, the paper poor, and there were too many typographical errors, a fault which is rightly held to be unforgivable. So the work had little success; and, the Marchese not being rich, it was one of the reasons for the couple's lack of harmony.

What showed me the quality of the Marchese's learning, intelligence, and judgment was reading his treatise on almsgiving and, even more, his apology.[3] I saw that all that he had said must have given offense in Rome, and that with his exquisite judgment he should have foreseen it. The Marchese Mosca was right, but in Rome only those are right whom Rome declares to be so, and she does that only of those whose opinions are not at variance with the abuses which she has made customary practice. The Marchese's treatise was full of erudition, and still more so his apology, which must have done him more harm than the treatise. He was a rigorist, and though he leaned toward Jansenism, he often refuted St. Augustine. He absolutely denied that the fixed penalty for sins could be made good by almsgiving; and he accepted as alone meritorious the alms given in accordance with the letter of the Gospel precept: "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." [4] In sum, he laid it down that giving alms was a sin unless it was done in the greatest secrecy, for otherwise vanity was bound to enter in.

Wanting to go to Trieste, I ought to have seized the opportunity to cross the Gulf [5] by taking ship at Pesaro on a tartan[6] which was leaving that very day and which, with the wind blowing as it was, would have landed me there in twelve hours. I ought to have gone there, for, aside from my having nothing to do in Ancona, I was making the journey a hundred miles longer; but I had said that I would go to Ancona, and for that reason alone I thought I ought to go there; a strong tincture of superstition was always characteristic of me, and it is clear to me today that it had an influence on all the strange vicissitudes of my life.

Perfectly understanding what it was that Socrates called his "Demon," [7] which seldom prompted him to take some decisive action and very often prevented him from making up his mind to it, I easily thought I had the same Genius, he having chosen to call his Genius his "Demon." Sure that this Genius could only be good and bent on my best welfare, I turned to him every time I was in doubt how to choose because I had no compelling reason. I did what he wanted, without asking him the reason for it, when a secret voice told me to abstain from an act toward which I felt inclined. The secret voice could only be the action of my demon. I have paid him this tribute countless times in my life, and I often inwardly complained of him because he very seldom prompted me to do something which, having consulted my reason, I was determined not to do. Following this course, I have more often had cause to congratulate myself on having laughed at my reason than on having obeyed it. But that has neither humiliated me nor kept me from always and everywhere reasoning to the best of my ability.

At Sinigaglia, three posts before Ancona, just as I was about to go to bed, my coachman comes to ask me if I will let him take a Jew in the carriage who also wanted to go to Ancona. I coldly reply that I want no one, least of all a Jew. The coachman leaves, and I instantly feel that I ought to take the Jew with me, despite the reasonable repugnance which had made me say I did not want him. So I call the coachman back, and I say that I am willing. He then tells me that I must prepare to leave earlier than usual, for, it being Friday, the Jew could travel only until sunset. I reply that I have no intention of putting myself out, and that it is for him to make his horses go faster.

The next morning in the carriage the Jew, who looked not unprepossessing, asked me why I did not like Jews.

"Because," I said, "your religion makes it your duty to be our enemies. You think it your duty to cheat us. You do not consider us your brothers. You set no limit to your usury when, needing money, we borrow it from you. In short, you hate us."

"Signore," he replied, "you are mistaken. Come to our assembly with me this evening, and you will hear us praying together for all Christians, beginning with our master the Pope."

At that I could not but burst out laughing, for it was true; however, I told him that what prayed must be the heart, not the mouth, and I threatened to throw him out of the carriage if he would not admit that the Jews would certainly not pray for Christians if they were the rulers of the countries in which they lived, and he was surprised to hear me quote to him in Hebrew passages from the Old Testament in which they were commanded to seize every opportunity to do all the harm they could to all non-Jews, whom they constantly cursed in their prayers. The poor man did not open his mouth again. At dinnertime I invited him to dine with me, and he replied that his religion forbade it, for which reason he would eat only eggs, fruit, and goose sausage, which he had in his pocket. His superstition made him drink only water because, he said, he was not certain the wine was pure. That afternoon in the carriage he told me that if I would like to lodge in his house, and would be content to eat only food that God has not forbidden, he would feed me more delicately, more substantially, and more cheaply than at an inn, all by myself in a fine room facing the sea.

"So you lodge Christians?" I asked him.

"Never, but I will make an exception this time to enlighten you. You shall give me only six paoli a day, and I will have dinner and supper served you, but without wine."

"But you will have your cook prepare all the kinds of fish I like and want to eat, which of course I will buy on my own account."

"Certainly. I have a Christian maid-of-all-work, and my wife always oversees the cooking."

"You will give me goose liver every day, but on condition that you will eat it with me in my presence."

"I know what you are thinking. But you shall have your wish."

So I put up at the Jew's, thinking it very strange. Not being comfortable there, I should have left the next day. His wife and children were eagerly awaiting him, to celebrate the Sabbath. On that day consecrated to the Lord, all servile labor being forbidden, I see with pleasure the holiday look in their faces, their attire, and the cleanliness of the whole house. I am greeted like a brother, and I respond as well as I can; but a single word spoken by the master (whom I shall call Mordecai)[8] instantly changes the whole nature of their politeness; at first it was genuine, what followed was only policy based on interest. Mordecai shows me two rooms to choose between, and, one being next to the other, I take them both, saying at once that I will pay him an extra paolo. The mistress of the house orders a Christian maid to do everything necessary for me, and to make me supper. In an instant Mordecai has told her everything. While waiting for the maid to arrange all the things the coachman had brought in, I am pleased to go to the synagogue with Mordecai, who, having become my landlord, seemed to me another man, and the more so because I had seen his family and his house, where I had found everything very clean.

After attending the short ceremony, at which the Israelites paid not the least attention either to me or to some other Christians, both men and women, who were present, I went alone to stroll by the Exchange,[9] giving way to gloomy reflections, as they cannot but be when they recall a past time of happiness which one cannot hope will return. It was in this city that I had begun to enjoy life to the full, and I was astounded that it was almost thirty years earlier,[10] an immense length of time, and that I nevertheless felt more young than old. But what a contrast when I took the measure of my moral and physical existence in those days of my youth, and compared them with the present! I found myself a wholly different person, and the more I saw that I was perfectly happy then, the more I had to admit that I had become unhappy, for the whole beautiful prospect of a happier future no longer stretched before my eyes. Despite myself, I knew, and I was forced to admit, that I had wasted all my time, which meant that I had wasted my life; the twenty years I had still before me, and on which I thought I could count, seemed to me gloomy. Being forty-seven, I knew that I was at the age which Fortune scorns, and this in itself was all that I needed to sadden me, for without the Blind Goddess's favor no one on earth can be happy. Working as I was to be able to return to my country a free man, I thought I was limiting my desires to obtaining the favor of retracing my steps, of undoing what I had done for good or for ill. I understood that it was only a matter of making less unpleasant a descent the final term of which was death. It is on his descent that a man who has spent his life in pleasures makes these somber reflections, for which there is no place in his flourishing youth, when he needs to foresee nothing, when the present occupies him completely, and when an ever unchanging and rose-colored horizon makes his life happy, and keeps his mind so happily illuded that he laughs at the philosopher who dares to tell him that, behind the charming horizon, there is old age, wretchedness, repentance, which always comes too late, and death. If such were my reflections twenty-six years ago,[11] my reader can imagine what those must be which today obsess me when I am alone. They would kill me if I did not find ways to kill the cruel time which brings them to birth in my soul, which, fortunately or unfortunately, is still young. I write in order not to be bored; and I am delighted, I congratulate myself, that I enjoy doing it; if I write nonsense, I do not care, it is enough for me to know that I am being amused:

Malo scriptor delirus inersque videri
Dum mea delectent mala me vel denique fallant,
Quam sapere et ringi

> ("I would rather appear to be a scatterbrained and unskillful writer, so long as my faults please me or escape me, than be wise and chafe").[12]

Back at the house, I found Mordecai at table with his family, consisting of eleven or twelve persons, one of them his mother, who was ninety years old and in good health. Another Jew, a middle-aged man, was the husband of his elder daughter, who struck me as not pretty; but I found much to admire in his younger daughter, whom he was going to marry to a Jew from Pesaro, whom she had not yet seen.

"If you haven't seen him," I said to her, "you can't be in love with him."

She replied in a serious tone that being in love was not a necessary condition for marriage. The grandmother praised her answer, and my landlady said that she had not fallen in love with her husband until after she had borne her first child. I will call the pretty Jewess Leah,[13] having reasons for concealing her name; I said things to her to make her laugh; but she did not even look at me.

I found a supper without meat, but exquisite, and with everything perfectly Christian, and I retired to an excellent bed. The next morning Mordecai came and told me that I could give my linen to the maid to wash, and that Leah would see to making it ready for me. I thanked him for the shellfish, and I told him I had a dispensation which permitted me to eat both meat and fish every day, and above all not to forget the goose liver. He said that I should have it the next day, but that no one in his family ate it except Leah.

"Then Leah," I said, "shall eat it with me, and I will give her the purest wine from the Kingdom of Cyprus[14] to drink."

I asked the Venetian Consul[15] for some that same morning, going to his residence to take him a letter from Signor Dandolo. The Consul was a Venetian of the old school. He had heard of me, and he seemed very glad to make my acquaintance. He was a real Pantalone[16] without a mask, lively, full of experience, and an epicure. He took my money and gave me some genuine Scopolo wine[17] and some very old muscat from Cyprus; but he protested loudly when I told him I was lodging at Mordecai's, and what chance had taken me there. He said that he was rich but that, being a great usurer, he would treat me badly if I needed money. After telling him that I did not want to leave until the end of the month, and on a good ship, I went back to my room, where I found myself very comfortable. The next morning I wrote down all the linen and silk stockings which I gave to the maid, as Mordecai had told me to do; but a moment later he came with Leah, for she wanted to know how I wanted her to wash the laces which were attached to my shirts, then he left her with me. Between eighteen and twenty years of age, and appearing before me in perfect candor in a bodice which could not better reveal a firm bosom as white as alabaster, the girl troubled me, and she would have seen it if, having any suspicion of it, she had looked at me. Mastering myself, I told her to take care of my linen as diligently as possible, for I was not a man to pinch pennies. She said that she would attend to it all herself, if I was not in a hurry. I replied that it was in her power to keep me in her house as long as she pleased, to which declaration she paid not the slightest attention. I told her I was satisfied with everything, except the chocolate, which I liked whipped and foamy, and she answered that she would prepare it herself.

"In that case," I said, "I will give you twice the quantity, and we will drink it together."

She said she did not like it.

"But you like goose liver?"

"Very much, and today I am to eat it with you, my father tells me. Am I to take it you are afraid you'll be poisoned?"

"Certainly not. On the contrary, I wish we could die together."

Leah pretended not to understand me, and left me full of desires and resolved to lose no time. I must either make sure of her that same day, or tell her father not to send her to my room any more. The Jewess in Turin[18] had taught me what to think of Jewesses in the matter of love. As I saw it, Leah must prove to be both more beautiful and less difficult, for gallantry in Ancona must be entirely different from gallantry in Turin. Such is the reasoning of a libertine, and he is often wrong.

I was given a meat dinner prepared entirely in the Jewish fashion, and Leah herself came in with the liver and sat down opposite me without any ado, but wearing a fichu over her beautiful bosom. The liver was exquisite, and since it was not large we ate it all, washing it down with Scopolo wine, which Leah declared was even better than the liver; then she got up to leave; but I objected: dinner was only half over. Leah said she would stay, but that her father would not like it. I told the maid to ask him to come up, for I had something to say to him. I told Mordecai that his daughter's appetite doubled mine, and that he would be doing me a favor if he allowed her to eat with me whenever we had goose liver. He replied that her doubling my appetite was precisely what he did not want, for he would lose money on boarding me, but that she should stay if I would pay him double, that is, a testone more. No logic could have pleased me better. I told him that I accepted his condition, and I presented him with a bottle of Scopolo, which Leah assured him was of the purest. So we dined together, and seeing her enlivened by the good wine, which, having diuretic properties because of its taste of tar, perfectly produces the effect which love seeks, I told her that her eyes set me on fire and that she must let me kiss them. She replied that her duty forbade her to permit it.

"No kissing, and no touching," she said; "let us eat and drink together, and I shall enjoy it as much as you do. But that must be all. I am entirely dependent on my father, and can have no will of my own.''

''Must I ask your father to allow you to be kind?''

''I don't think that would be proper, and my father might well take it as an insult and not let me come to your room again.''

''And if he told you that you need not be scrupulous about such trifles?''

''I should despise him, and I should continue to do my duty.''

So clear a declaration showed me that she would not be easy, and that, if I persisted, I might find myself committed, fail, repent, and lose sight of my chief business, which obliged me to make no more than a very short stay in Ancona. So I did not answer her, and, finding the Jewish pastries and compotes excellent at dessert, we drank some Cyprus muscat, which Leah declared superior to all the liqueurs on earth.

Seeing her so carried away by drink, I thought it impossible that Venus should not have as much power over her as Bacchus; but her head was strong; the wine did not go to it; her blood was fired, but her reason remained unaffected. I encouraged her high spirits, and after coffee I took her hand to kiss it, and she resisted; but her refusal was of a kind at which I could not take umbrage. She told me wittily that it was too much for honor and too little for love. I at once felt certain that she was no novice. I put off my design until the next day, and I informed her that I should sup with the Venetian Consul. He had told me that he never dined, but that he would always be very glad to have me come to supper.

I came home at midnight; everyone was asleep, except for the maid, who was waiting for me and whom I tipped well. I got her to talk about Leah, but she told me nothing to the purpose. Leah was a good girl, always working, the whole family loved her, and she had never listened to a suitor. It was just the sort of thing she would have said if Leah had paid her.

But Leah came in the morning to bring me my chocolate, and sat down on my bed, saying that we had an excellent liver and that, since she had not supped, she would dine with a very good appetite. She said that what had kept her from supping was the excellent Cyprus muscat, about which her father had been very curious. I said that we would give him some. Leah was there, as she had been on the evening before. Her breasts drove me to despair, and I thought it impossible that she should not be aware of their power. I asked her if she knew that her bosom was very beautiful. She replied that all girls' bosoms were like hers.

"Do you know," I asked, "that the sight of it gives me extreme pleasure?"

"If that is true, I am very glad of it, for it is a pleasure I can give you without having any reason to reproach myself. In any case a girl does not hide her bosom any more than she does her face, except when she is on parade in company."

As she said this, the minx looked at a small gold heart pierced by an arrow and covered with little diamonds which I used to fasten my jabot.

"Do you think my little heart is pretty?" I asked her.

"Charming. Is it pure gold?"

"Yes. And that is what gives me the courage to present it to you."

With that, I unfasten it to give it to her, but she says, thanking me sweetly, that a girl who intends to give nothing must accept nothing. I beg her to accept it, and I give her my word of honor that I will never ask her for the slightest favor; she replies that, even so, she would consider herself in my debt, and that she would never accept anything.

After this declaration I saw that there was nothing to be done, or too much to do, and that in either case I must come to a decision. I scornfully rejected the idea of employing a violence which might have made her laugh at me or anger her; in the first case it would both have degraded me and made me more in love to no purpose, and in the second case, since the right would be on her side, I should have given her the right to take steps which would have humiliated and offended me. She would have stopped coming to bring me chocolate, and I could not have complained of it. I decided to keep my eyes in check, and not to speak another amorous word to her. We dined in very high spirits. I was served shellfish which her religion forbade her, I urged her to eat some, and I horrified her, but when the maid was gone she ate some with surprising relish, assuring me that it was the first time in her life that she had enjoyed the pleasure.

"This girl," I said to myself, "who breaks the law of her religion so easily, who is passionately fond of pleasure, who does not hide the relish with which she enjoys it, tries to make me think that she is insensible to the pleasure of love, or that she can conquer it by treating it as a trifle. It is impossible. She does not love me, or she loves me only to amuse herself by keeping me in love with her; and to satisfy the needs of her temperament, she apparently has other resources."

I thought of having her to supper, counting on the strength of the Scopolo wine, and she excused herself, assuring me that if she ate in the evening she could not sleep.

She came to bring me chocolate, and the first thing that strikes me is that her too beautiful bosom is covered by a white kerchief. She sat down beside me on the bed, and I reject the stale idea of pretending not to notice it. I say in a melancholy voice that she had come with her bosom covered only because I had told her it gave me pleasure to see it. She replies carelessly that she had not thought about it and had only knotted a kerchief over it because she hadn't had time to put on her bodice. I say with a laugh that she had done well, for it might be that, seeing her whole bosom, I should not think it so beautiful after all. She makes no answer, and I finish my chocolate. I think of the miniatures and engravings of lascivious nudes which I had in my jewel case, and I ask Leah to give it to me, saying that I want to show her pictures of the most beautiful bosoms in the universe. She says they would not interest her; but after bringing me my case she stays where she is.

I take the picture of a woman lying on her back stark naked and masturbating, but I cover it up to the navel with a handkerchief, and I show it to her, holding it in my hand. She says that it is a bosom like any other, and that I can uncover the rest. I hand her the miniature, saying that it disgusts me. Leah laughs, and she says it is well painted, but that it is nothing new to her, for it was all that girls did, though secretly, before they married.

"Then you do it too?"

"Every time I feel like it. Then I go to sleep."

"My dear Leah, your sincerity drives me to distraction, and you are too intelligent not to know it. So either be kind and obliging, or stop coming to see me."

"You must be very weak. So in future we will see each other only at dinner. But show me another miniature."

"I have some engravings which you won't like."

"Let me see."

At that I give her the collection of illustrations for Aretino,[19] and I admire the calm though very attentive way in which she looks at them, going from one to another, and returning to the one she has already examined.

"Do you find it interesting?" I asked her.

"Very much so, and it's only natural; but a decent girl mustn't look long at these things, for you can imagine that they arouse a strong emotion."

"I believe it, my dear Leah, and I feel it as you do. Look."

At that she smiled, and she quickly got up and went to look at the book by the window, turning her back to me and leaving me to call to her as much as I pleased. After calming myself like a schoolboy, I dressed, and, the hairdresser arriving, Leah left, saying that she would return my book to me at dinner.

I then believed I should have her on the next day at the latest. My libertine approach had not offended her, the first step was taken. We dined well, we drank still better, and at dessert Leah drew the collection from her pocket, and she inflamed me by asking for commentaries but at the same time preventing me, on threat of leaving, from proceeding to the demonstration which would have given life to the explanation, which was only for the eyes, and which I perhaps needed more than she did. Out of patience, I took the book away from her, and I went for a walk, counting on the hour when she would bring me my chocolate.

Leah told me that she needed to ask me for explanations, but that if I wanted to please her I must give them to her only in words and with the engraving in my hand. She would not look at any living demonstrations. I said that she must likewise answer all the questions I might ask her in regard to her sex, and she promised she would do so; but on the same condition that our observations should concern only what we saw in the pictures.

Our lesson lasted two hours, during which I cursed Aretino countless times, for the pitiless Leah threatened to leave each time I tried to put one of her arms under my coverlet. But the things she said to me concerning her sex, and which I could pretend not to know, drove me to distraction. She told me the most voluptuous truths, and she put such sincerity and animation into explaining the internal and external movements which must take place during the cohabitations we had before our eyes that it seemed to me impossible that theory alone could lead her to reason so correctly. What seduced me completely was the fact that no shame obscured the clarity of her sublime teaching. She philosophized on the subject far more learnedly than the Genevan Hedwig.[20] Her intellect was in such perfect accord with the rest of her being that it seemed to be detached from it. I would have given her all that I possessed to reward her prodigious talent with the great exploit. She swore to me that she knew nothing from experience, and I thought I must believe her when she confided to me that she could not wait to be married in order to learn all. She grew sad, or she pretended it, when I took it into my head to tell her that the husband her father Mordecai had chosen for her might be a man poorly equipped by Nature, or one of those ill-constituted cacochymics[21] who do their conjugal duty only once a week.

"What!" she answered in alarm. "Then are not all men alike, as we are? Are they not all able to be amorous every day, as they must eat and drink and sleep every day?"

"On the contrary, my dear Leah, men who are amorous every day are very scarce."

So cruelly exasperated every morning, I was furious that there was no decent place in Ancona where a gentleman could have his pleasure by paying for it. I trembled to realize that I was falling in love with Leah; I told the Consul every day that I was in no hurry to leave. I indulged in all the paralogisms[22] of a true lover; I thought Leah was the most virtuous of all girls; she became my model of virtue; it was upon her that I built my definition of it. She was all true, unstained by hypocrisy as by imposture; unable to escape her nature, she satisfied her desires only by herself, and she forbade herself all that was forbidden her by the law to which she was determined to remain obedient despite the fire which burned her from morning to night and from night to morning. It was in her power to make herself happy, and she resisted for two long hours in my company, adding fuel to the fire which devoured her, and being strong enough to refuse ever to do anything to extinguish it. Ah, the virtuous Leah! Every day she risked defeat, and every day she gained the victory, assuring herself of it by the one sovereign remedy of never yielding to the first step. No looking and no touching.

After nine or ten days I began to be violent with the girl, not in action but by the force of eloquence. She was abashed, she admitted that I was right and that she did not know how to answer me, and she ended by saying that it would be a wise resolve on my part to forbid her to enter my room in the morning. At dinner, she insisted, we ran no risk. I decided to ask her to continue to come to my room, but always with her bosom covered and never again talking of the illustrations for Aretino or of anything to do with love. She replied with a laugh that she would not be the first to break those conditions. I did not break them either, but three days later, tired of suffering, I told the Consul that I would leave at the first opportunity. Under our new compact, Leah's gaiety was making me lose my appetite. But this is what happened.

Two hours after midnight I woke, feeling a need to go to the water closet. It was on the ground floor and Mordecai always saw that it was kept very clean. I go downstairs barefoot and in the dark, and, after doing my business, I go back to the stairway to return to my apartment. At the top of the first flight of stairs I see light through a crack in the door of a room which I knew should be unoccupied. I go there to see who could be in the room at such an hour with a light. My curiosity was not inspired by any idea of seeing Leah, for I knew that she slept on the other side of the house; but to my great surprise I see Leah lying stark naked on a bed, practicing postures with a young man in the same state. They were no more than two paces from the door, I saw everything perfectly. They were talking in whispers, and every four or five minutes they presented me with a new tableau. This change of posture showed me Leah's beauties from every angle. The pleasure somewhat soothed my fury, which however was not little when what I saw left me in no doubt that Leah was only imitating the illustrations for Aretino, which she had learned by heart. When they came to the essential act they set themselves limits and, working with their hands, procured the ecstasies of love, which, imperfect though they were, nevertheless tried me cruelly. When the young man assumed the straight tree[23] position, Leah unashamedly played the Lesbian, and he devoured her jewel, and, not seeing her spit at the end of the act, I was sure that she had imbibed the nectar of my fortunate rival. Her lover then laughingly showed her his flaccid instrument, whose death Leah appeared to mourn. She was about to restore it to life; but the base fellow looked at his watch, paid no attention to her protests, and put on his shirt. She did not do likewise until after she had spoken to him in a way from which I guessed that she was reproaching him. When I saw that they were nearly dressed, I went to my room and stationed myself at a window which overlooked the door of the house. Four or five minutes later I saw the fortunate lover come out and leave. I went back to bed, not delighted to have been disabused, but indignant and feeling debased. Since I no longer saw Leah as virtuous, she seemed to me nothing but a wanton who hated me. I went to sleep intending to drive her from my room after reproaching her with all that I had seen.

But when she appeared with my chocolate I suddenly changed my mind. Seeing her gay, I forced my features to assume a corresponding expression, and, after drinking my chocolate, I told her without the slightest show of anger the story of all her exploits which I had been able to see during the last hour of her orgy, dwelling on the straight tree and on the excellent food which, like a true Lesbian, she had taken into her stomach. I ended by saying that I hoped she would give me the next night, not only to satisfy my love but also to oblige me to keep her secret safe.

She replied unabashedly that I could not expect the least favor from her, for she did not love me, and, as for keeping her secret, she defied me to reveal it out of revenge.

"I am sure," she said, "that you are not capable of so base an act."

Having said which, she turned her back on me and left.

And in fact what she had said was the truth. I should have been guilty of a very base act, and I was far from resolved to commit it; I was not even thinking of it. She had made me see reason by a great truth, which, hard as it was to swallow, demanded respect: she did not love me; there was no answer to that, she owed me nothing, I could demand nothing. It was she, on the contrary, who could demand satisfaction from me, for I had no right to spy on her or to insult her by telling her what I should never have known except from an indiscreet and indefensible curiosity. I could only complain of her because she had deceived me So what could I do?

I did what I ought to do. I dressed hastily, I went to the Exchange, where I found that a peota[24] was leaving that day for Fiume. Fiume is on the other side of the Gulf, opposite Ancona. From Fiume to Trieste is only forty miles by land; I decided to go to Fiume, I go to the port, I see the peota, I speak to the captain, who tells me that the wind is astern, and that he is sure that the next morning we shall be at least in the Canal.[25] I engage the best place, I have a folding seat put in it, then I go to take leave of the Consul, who wishes me a good journey. From there I return to the house, where I pay Mordecai all that I owed him, and I go to my room to pack my trunks. I have plenty of time.

Leah comes to tell me that she cannot possibly give me my linen and my stockings that day, but that she could give me everything the next. I reply calmly and quietly that her father need only take whatever belonged to me to the Venetian Consul, who will send it on to me in Trieste. She makes no answer.

A moment before I sat down at table the captain of the peota[26] himself came with a sailor to take my belongings, I give him the trunk I had packed, and I tell him that the rest will go on board with me when he is ready to leave. He says that he will leave an hour before nightfall, and I reply that he will find me ready.

When Mordecai learned that I was going to Fiume, he asked me to take charge of a small box which he wanted conveyed to a friend of his, together with a letter which he would write him; I replied that I should be glad to oblige him.

Leah sat down to dinner with me as if nothing had happened. She spoke to me in her usual way, she asked me if I was satisfied with what I was eating, and my short answers no more put her out of countenance than my determined attempt never to let her look me in the eye. She must have believed that I took her attitude for strength of mind, firmness, noble confidence, whereas it seemed to me nothing short of exaggerated effrontery. I hated her because she had deceived me and had then dared to tell me that she did not love me, and I despised her because she believed I ought to esteem her because she did not blush. She may also have believed that I ought to esteem her because she had avowed that I was incapable of telling her father what I had seen. She could not understand that I owed her nothing for her confidence.

As she drank Scopolo, she said that I still had two flagons of it and two bottles of muscat. I answered that I left them to her as excellent means of increasing her fire during her nocturnal debauches. She replied with a smile that I had enjoyed for nothing a spectacle which she was sure I would have paid gold to see, and that she was so glad of it that she would arrange for me to enjoy it again if I were not going to leave.

This reply made me want to hit her in the face with the bottle which stood before me. I picked it up in a way to show her what just anger was about to make me do, and I should have committed the shameful crime if I had not seen on her face the unmistakable expression of a defiant assurance. I poured wine into my glass, very awkwardly, as if I had picked up the bottle only for that purpose; but when one is going to pour wine one simply picks up the bottle, one does not seize it in one's inverted fist. Leah noticed it.

I rose and went into my bedroom, unable to bear more; but a quarter of an hour later she came to drink coffee with me. This most insulting persistence seemed to me monstrous. I calmed myself a little when I reflected that such a proceeding on her part must spring from a spirit of revenge; but she had avenged herself enough by telling me that she did not love me and proving it to me. She said that she wanted to help me pack, and at that I asked her to leave me alone, taking her by the arm, leading her to the door, and locking it after her.

We were both in the right. Leah had deceived, humiliated, and scorned me. I had every right to loathe her. I had discovered that she was supremely hypocritical, deceitful, and shameless. She had every right to loathe my existence, and she would have wished that I would practice some crime on her which would make me repent of having discovered her secret. I have never been in a state more violent.

Toward evening two sailors came for my belongings, I thanked my landlady, and I calmly told Leah to wrap my linen in waxed cloth and deliver it all to her father, who had already gone ahead to put his box in the peota. He gave me the letter, I embraced him and thanked him, and we sailed at once with a fresh breeze, which dropped two hours later. We had gone twenty miles. After a quarter of an hour of calm, the wind began blowing from the west, and then the little ship, which was almost empty, began pitching and tossing so cruelly that my stomach was upset and I began to vomit. At midnight, the wind having become completely contrary, the captain told me that the best thing for him to do was to go back to Ancona. With a head wind it was impossible to go to Fiume or to any port in Istria. So in less than three hours we were back in Ancona, where the officer on guard, having recognized us as the same persons who had left about nightfall, was kind enough to let me go ashore.[27]

While I was talking to the officer, thanking him for allowing me to go and sleep in a good bed, the sailors picked up my luggage and, instead of waiting for me to tell them where they should take it, the captain told me they had gone with it to the same place from which they had fetched it. I wanted to go to the nearest inn, it made me furious that I must see Leah again, but the thing was done. Mordecai got out of bed and congratulated himself on seeing me again. It was three hours after midnight. I went to bed, exhausted and badly in need of rest. I told him that I was very ill, and that I would dine alone in my bed when I called him. A light dinner, and no liver. I slept for ten unbroken hours, with my whole body aching but feeling that I had an excellent appetite. I rang, and it was the maid who came to tell me that Leah was in bed with a severe headache; I thanked Providence for saving me from the pain of seeing the brazen creature again.

I had found my dinner very scanty, I told the maid to make me a good supper. The weather was dreadful. The Venetian Consul came to spend two hours with me, assuring me that the weather would remain bad for at least a week—a warning which distressed me both because of Leah whom I could not possibly see again, and because I had no more money; but I had articles of value. Not having seen Leah at suppertime, I thought she would not come again; but my hope was vain. She came the next morning and asked me for chocolate so that she could prepare it for me; but the look she wore was neither cheerful nor calm. I told her that I would drink coffee, that I wanted no more goose liver, and so I should eat alone, and to tell her father that in consequence I would pay him only seven paoli a day; and that in future I would drink only Orvieto wine.

"You still have four bottles."

"No, I haven't, for I gave them to you; I beg you to leave and to enter this room as seldom as possible, for your sentiments and the style you are pleased to use to express them are such as to make the most philosophical of men lose all moderation. Add that your presence disgusts me. Your exterior no longer has any power to blind me to the fact that it contains the soul of a monster. You may be sure, too, that the sailors brought my luggage here while I was talking to the officer on guard, otherwise I should not have come here; I should have gone to an inn, where I should not have feared being poisoned."

Leah left without answering me, and I felt certain that I had seen the last of her. Experience had taught me that girls of Leah's sort were not uncommon; I had known her like in Spa, in Geneva, in London, and even in Venice, but this Jewess was the worst of them all. It was a Saturday; on his return from the synagogue Mordecai came to ask me smilingly why I had mortified his daughter, who swore to him that she had not given me the slightest reason to complain of her.

"I had no intention of mortifying her, my dear Mordecai; but, needing to diet, I told her that I wanted no more goose livers; from which it follows that I can eat alone and so save three paoli."

"Leah is prepared to pay them to me, and she wants to dine with you to rid you of any fear of being poisoned. She told me that you feared it."

"Your daughter, my friend, is fooled by her own cleverness. I have no need either for her to pay you three paoli, or not to spend them myself, and to convince you of it I will pay you six, but on condition that you will eat with me too. Her offering to pay the three paoli is an impertinence of a piece with her character. In short: either I will eat alone and pay you seven paoli a day, or I will pay you thirteen and eat with both father and daughter. That is my final word."

He left, saying that he had not the heart to let me eat alone. I got up for dinner; I talked only to Mordecai, never once looking at Leah or laughing at the witty things she said from time to time. I would drink only Orvieto wine. At dessert Leah filled my glass with Scopolo, saying that if I persisted in not drinking it she would not drink it either. I replied that if she knew what was good for her she ought never to drink anything but water, and that I would accept nothing from her. Mordecai, who was fond of wine, laughed heartily, and saying that I was right, drank for the three of us.

The weather being bad, I spent the day writing, and, after being served supper by the maid, I went to bed and at once fell asleep. A little later a slight noise wakes me, I say "Who's there?" and I hear Leah answering in a whisper that she has not come to trouble me but to justify herself in half an hour and then let me sleep. So saying, she lies down beside me, but on top of the coverlet.

This visit, which I did not expect, since I thought it was not in accord with the girl's character, pleases me, for, having no feeling in respect to her but a desire to be revenged, I was sure that I should not succumb to anything she might do to gain the victory. So, far from being curt with her, I tell her mildly that I consider her justified, and I beg her to leave, since I needed to sleep. She replies that she will not let me sleep until I have heard her out.

She followed this by a harangue which I never once interrupted and which went on for a good hour. Whether trumped up, or proceeding from genuine feeling, it was calculated to persuade me, for, after admitting that she had done very wrong, she maintained that at my age and with my experience I ought to forgive everything in a girl of eighteen, weak because of the irresistible dominion over her of a temperament [28] whose instinct for love deprived her of the use of her reason. According to her, I ought to forgive so fatal a weakness for everything, even for crimes, for, if she went so far as to commit them, it would only be because she had no power over herself. She swore to me that she loved me, and that she would have given me the most telling proofs of it if she had not had the misfortune to be in love with the Christian I had seen with her, who was a beggar and a libertine who did not love her and whom she paid. She assured me that, despite her temperament, she had never let him cull her flower. She swore that it had been six months since she had seen him, and that it was I who was the cause of her having summoned him that night, for I had set her soul on fire with my engravings and my wines. The conclusion of her long apology was that I must restore peace to her soul by forgetting everything and granting her my sincere friendship during the few remaining days I should spend in her house.

When she stopped talking I chose not to refute any of the points in her harangue by the slightest objection. I pretended to be convinced that I had wronged her by showing her too lascivious pictures, I condoled with her on her misfortune in having fallen in love with a beggar, and on the irresistible force with which Nature had endowed her senses, which left her with no power over herself, and I ended by assuring her that she would see no more signs of even the slightest resentment in my behavior.

But since this declaration did not end in what the minx wanted, she went on talking to me about the weakness of the senses, the strength of self-esteem, which often bound fond love in fetters and led a heart to act against its dearest wishes, for she wanted to persuade me that she loved me and that she had only confined me to trifles to make my love stronger by conquering my esteem. It was her nature which had driven her to act so, and it was not her fault if she had been unable to act otherwise.

How many answers I could have given her! I could have answered that it was precisely because of her loathsome and accursed nature that I ought to hate her and that I hated her; but I did not want to discourage her completely, for I wanted to see her advance to the assault, so that I could overwhelm her with humiliation; but the minx never went so far. She never held out her arms, she never put her face close to mine. But after the contest, and as soon as she was gone, I was very glad that she had never really engaged me, for she would have been the victor, even though we were without a light. Segnius irritant animos demissa per aures ("The mind is less strongly affected by what enters through the ears").[29] When she talked to me about the prodigious power which Venus had over her, I remembered what I had seen her do in the straight tree position, and if Leah had attacked me then I should have found it difficult to resist. She left after two hours defeated, but with every appearance of being content. I thought I had to promise her that she could make my chocolate. She came very early for a stick of it, in the most lascivious undress, walking on tiptoe for fear of waking me, whereas if she had ever once looked at my bed she would have seen that I was not asleep. Finding her as false and artful as ever, I congratulated myself on being equal to all her wiles.

She came with my chocolate, and, seeing two cups, I said that it must not be true that she did not like it. She replied that she thought it her duty to relieve me of my fear of being poisoned. What I also thought worth remarking on was that she had come to bring my chocolate with her bosom well covered and wearing a dress, whereas half an hour earlier she had come in only a shift and petticoat. The more I saw that she was bent on catching me by the bait of her attractions, the more I felt resolved to humiliate her by indifference. I considered that the only alternative to my victory was my dishonor and my shame; so I felt ready to meet every contingency.

Nevertheless, my palate began to get the better of me at dinner. Against my orders, Leah had me served a goose liver, saying that it was for her and that, since it was poisoned, she would die alone; Mordecai said that he would die too, and he ate some of it; at that I laughed and ate some, and Leah said that my resolves were not strong enough to stand up in the presence of the enemy. This judgment annoyed me. I said to her that she had given herself away, which showed a lack of intelligence, and that I was strong enough to defy temptation.

"Try," I said, "to get me to drink Scopolo or muscat. Yet I should have drunk some now if you had not reproached me with the weakness of my resolves. I will convince you that they are invincible."

"The agreeable man," she replied, "is the one who often lets himself be conquered."

"But the agreeable girl is the one who does not reproach him with his weaknesses."

I sent to the Consul's for Scopolo and muscat, and Leah, who could not contain herself, annoyed me again by saying with a knowing smile that I was the most agreeable of men.

After dinner I left the house despite the bad weather, and I walked to the coffeehouse. Feeling sure that Leah would come that night to attack me again, I went there to see if I could find someone who could take me somewhere to buy amorous pleasures. A Greek who a week before had taken me to a house which I had found disgusting took me to another where a countrywoman of his, covered with rouge, displeased me even more. I went home, where, after supping alone as usual, I decided that my only course was to bolt my door, which I had done only twice before. But it made no difference. A minute later Leah knocks and calls to me that I have forgotten to give her chocolate. I open the door, and, taking a stick of chocolate, she begs me to leave my door unbolted, for she needed urgently to talk to me and it would be for the last time.

"Tell me now what you want."

"No. It's rather long, I can't come until everyone in the house is asleep. In any case you have nothing to fear, even if you go to bed, for you are your own master, and for you I am no longer a danger."

"Certainly not. You will find the door unbolted."

Still resolved to resist all her artifices, I thought it best not to blow out my candles, for, since I was sure she would come, my putting them out would show her that I was afraid. The light would make my triumph the greater, and allow me to enjoy her humiliation and shame all the more. So I got into bed.

Leah arrives at eleven o'clock in shift and petticoat, she bolts the door, and when I ask her, "Well, what have you to say to me?" she comes to my bedside, she lets her petticoat drop, then her shift, and lies down close to me, throwing the covers aside. Sure of her triumph, she does not hesitate, she says nothing, she clasps me to her bosom, she bestrides me, she deluges me with kisses, and in short in a single instant she deprives me of all my faculties except the one I do not want to have for her. I use my only remaining moment of reflection to tell myself I am a fool, that Leah was nothing if not intelligent and that she knew human nature far better than I did. In no time my caresses become as ardent as hers, she lets me devour her breasts, and she brings me to the point of death on the surface of the tomb, in which to my astonishment she convinces me that she could not bury me except by unlocking it.

"My dear Leah," I said to her after a short silence, "I adore you, how can I have hated you, how can you have wanted me to hate you? Is it possible that you came here into my arms only to humiliate me, to win a vain victory? If that is your idea, I forgive you; but you are wrong, for my enjoyment is far more delicious, believe me, than any pleasure you can feel from your revenge."

"No, my dear friend. I am here neither to triumph, nor to avenge myself, nor to win a shameful victory; I am here to give you the greatest proof of my love, and to make you my true conqueror. Make me happy in an instant: break this barrier which I have preserved unbroken until now despite its weakness and despite Nature; and if the sacrifice I make you allows you still to doubt the sincerity of my affection, it will be you who will become the most wicked, the most unworthy of men."

At that, without losing any more time than was demanded by a small arrangement dear even to an impatient love, I gathered a fruit the greatest novelty of which was its sweetness. On Leah's beautiful face I saw the extraordinary symptom of a delicious pain, and in her first ecstasy I felt her whole person trembling with the excess of pleasure which flooded it. The pleasure I felt seemed to me entirely new; determined not to let it reach its climax until I could not possibly prevent it, I kept Leah inseparable from me until three hours after midnight, and I aroused all her gratitude by making her receive my melting soul in the palm of her beautiful hand. Seeing me dead a moment later, she said that it was only justice, and we parted content, in love, and sure of each other. I slept until noon, and, when I saw her reappear, the thought of my leaving made me sad. I told her so, and she begged me to put it off as long as I possibly could. I told her that we would settle it that night. I got up, and meanwhile she carried away the sheet on which the maid would have seen the signs of our criminal connection. We dined most voluptuously. Mordecai, having become my table companion, prided himself on showing me that he was not miserly. I spent the afternoon at the Consul's, with whom I arranged to leave on a Neapolitan warship which was in quarantine and which, after being released, was to go to Trieste; so I was to spend another month in Ancona, and I adored Providence. I gave the Consul the gold box which I had had from the Elector of Cologne, removing his portrait from it. Three or four days later he gave me forty zecchini for it; it was all I needed. My stay in Ancona cost me a great deal; but when I told Mordecai that I should spend another month in his house he peremptorily declared that he would have no more of my feeding him at my table; so Leah was left to dine with me alone. I have always believed that the Jew knew that his daughter did not refuse me her favors. Jews are not difficult in this respect, for, knowing that a son which one of us might give to one of their women would be a Jew, they think that letting us do so is getting the better of us. But I spared my dear Leah.

What tokens of gratitude and increased affection when I told her that I should stay in her house another month! What blessings on the storm which had kept me from going to Fiume! We went to bed together every night, even on those on which the Jewish law[30] excommunicates the woman who indulges in love. I left Leah the little heart, which might have been worth ten zecchini; but she would accept nothing for having taken care of my linen for six weeks. In addition, she gave me six fine Indian handkerchiefs; I met her again in Pesaro six years later. I will speak of her then. I left Ancona on November 14th, and I arrived at Trieste on the 15th, going to lodge at the Locanda Grande.[31]

Pittoni. Zaguri. The Procurator Morosini. The Venetian Consul. Görz. The French Consul. Signora Leo. My devotion to the Tribunal of the State Inquisitors. Strasoldo. The Carniolan girl. General Burghausen.

THE INNKEEPER comes to ask my name, I strike my bargain with him, I find I am very well lodged on the third floor, and my bed is good. The next day I go to the post office for my letters, which had been awaiting me for a month. In one from Signor Dandolo I find another, unsealed, from the patrician Marco Donà[1] to Baron Pittoni,[2] the Chief of Police, recommending me in strong terms. I take a conveyance to his house, I present the letter to him, naming myself, and, without reading it, he tells me that Signor Donà had written him about me, and that he would show me every consideration at every opportunity. I then take a letter from Mordecai to the Jew Moses Levi,[3] in which I did not know that he had mentioned me; so I leave it at his office in his house. The Jew Levi, who proved to be sensible, amiable, and very well off, came to my apartment the next morning to offer me his services in every respect. He gave me the letter to read; I was the only subject of it; he told him that if I happened to need a hundred zecchini he would vouch for me, and that any favors he would do me he would consider done to himself.

I felt it incumbent on me to write Mordecai a most cordial letter of thanks and to offer him all my credit in Venice if he needed it. What a difference between Baron Pittoni's cold reception[4] and the Jew Levi's! Baron Pittoni, who was ten or twelve years younger than I, was amiable, amusing, well versed in literature, and without prejudices. At odds with all economy, he disapproved of the law of mine and thine, he left the conduct of his small house to his valet, who robbed him; but he did not protest, for he knew it. He was a bachelor on principle, a great panegyrist of celibacy, gallant with the fair sex, and the friend and protector of all libertines. Lazy and indolent, he was prone to an unforgivable absent-mindedness, which subjected him to the misfortune of often forgetting very important business of the greatest consequence to his official functions. He was said to be given to lying, but it was not true; he did not tell the truth because, having forgotten it, he could not tell it. I have portrayed his character as I learned to know it a month after making his acquaintance. We were good friends, and we are still good friends.

After announcing my arrival in Trieste to my friends in Venice, I spent a week or ten days in my room putting together the notes I had collected in Warsaw on everything that had happened in Poland after the death of Elizabeth Petrovna. I embarked on a history of the troubles[5] down to the partition which was being made at the time I was writing. This event, of which I had published a prediction[6] when, on the election of King Poniatowski, the Polish Diet recognized the Czarina who has just died as Empress of All the Russias, and the Elector of Brandenburg as King of Prussia, inspired me to write the whole history down to the partition; but I published only the first three volumes of it because of the dishonesty of the printer,[7] who did not fulfill the conditions on which we had agreed. The other four volumes will be found in manuscript after my death,[8] and whoever comes into possession of my papers may publish them if he pleases. It has become a matter of indifference to me, like so many other things since my time has shown me stupidity enthroned in absolute supremacy.

Poland, which no longer exists today, would still exist as it was at the death of Augustus III, Elector of Saxony, but for the ambition of the Czartoryski family, which Count Brühl, the King's Prime Minister, humiliated. To avenge himself, Augustus Czartoryski, Palatine of Russia, ruined his native country. Passion so blinded his profound intelligence that he forgot that the power of axioms, and especially in politics, is invincible. Having made up his mind not only to deny the House of Saxony any possibility of succeeding to the throne of Poland but also to dethrone the reigning monarch, and needing the friendship of the Czarina and the Elector of Brandenburg[9] to accomplish his design, he made the Diet recognize them, the former as Empress of All the Russias and the latter as King of Prussia. Failing that, the two sovereigns, who were perfectly in agreement, would not treat with the Republic. The Republic was right in not wanting to give them those titles, for it was the Republic which possessed the principal Russias, and the Republic which was King of Prussia, since the Elector of Brandenburg possessed only the Duchy of Prussia.[10] The Palatine of Russia, Czartoryski, blinded by his desire for revenge, proved to the Diet that the recognition meant nothing if the sovereigns wanted only the honor of the titles and undertook never to exercise their prerogatives. The sovereigns declared that they demanded only the titles; and the Republic acceded and granted them, and the Palatine of Russia had the pleasure of seeing Stanislaus Poniatowski, the son of his sister Constance, on the throne. I told the Palatine at the time that the titles granted gave them a real right, and that the promise never to make use of them would be meaningless or illusory, and that they would not have demanded them if they had not understood their importance. Though laughingly, for I could not discuss it except in a jesting tone, I told him again and again that, in consequence of the recognition, the whole of Europe must thenceforth regard Poland as no more than the depositary of White, Red, and Black Russia and of the Kingdom of Prussia, and that sooner or later the successors of the recognized sovereigns would relieve the depositary Republic of the burden of the deposit. It was not their successors but the sovereigns themselves who dismembered the Republic, but not on the strength of their titles. Policy, which always maintains a decent exterior, made it unnecessary for them to use them. The same sovereigns who then dismembered it finally divided it between them last year. The second extraordinary blunder which Poland, of which Czartoryski was then the soul, committed was not remembering the fable of the man and the horse[11] and applying it to protection. The Roman Republic became mistress of the entire then known world only by first becoming the protector of the countries which she appropriated. For this reason alone every sovereign asked for protection does not hesitate for an instant before granting it; it is the first step toward becoming the guardian, and from guardian the father, and then the master of his dear ward, if only to look after the latter's inheritance. It was thus that my mistress the Republic of Venice became mistress of the Kingdom of Cyprus, which the Grand Turk later took away from her in order to dispose of the good wine which is made there, despite the fact that the Koran ought to make him hate it.[12] Venice today exists only to her eternal shame.[13]

In short, ambition, revenge, and stupidity were the ruin of Poland, but most of all stupidity. The same stupidity, often the child of kindliness and indolence, began to ruin France on the accession of the too unfortunate Louis XVI.[14] Every king who has been dethroned must have been stupid, for no nation on earth has a king except by force. For this reason a stupid king must have an intelligent prime minister and make him very powerful. The King of France perished because of his stupidity, and France will perish because of the stupidity of that ferocious, mad, ignorant nation, blinded by its very intelligence and always fanatical. The disease which now reigns in France would be curable in any other country, but France it will lead to the tomb, and I have not intelligence enough to guess what she will become. The French émigrés may inspire pity in some, but not in me, for I hold that, if they had remained steadfastly in the kingdom, they could have opposed force to force and have spent their money having the firebrands killed without giving them time to kill the nation. History shows us no example of an assembly of imbecile peasants who, blinded by their position, imagine that that is possible which forty centuries prove to be impossible.[15] A headless body can endure only for a time, for reason lies in the brain, whose seat is the head.

On the first day of December Baron Pittoni sent me his valet to ask me to go to his house, where there was someone who had come from Venice expressly to see me. Extremely curious, I hastily dress, and the Baron introduces to me a prepossessing man thirty-five or forty years of age, elegantly clad, with a handsome, smiling face, who looks at me with what appears to be the greatest interest.

"My heart tells me," I said to him, "that Your Excellency is Signor Zaguri, for I see the style of your letters in your handsome countenance."

"Exactly so, my dear Casanova; as soon as my friend Dandolo told me, three days ago, that you are here, I decided to come and embrace you and congratulate you on your return to your country, which will certainly be an accomplished fact if not this year then next year at the latest, when I hope to see installed as State Inquisitors two men whom I have sometimes found not to be deaf and even to speak out. What must give you no slight proof of my friendship is that I have come to see you despite the fact that, being now an Avogador,[16] the law does not allow me to leave the capital. We shall spend all of today and tomorrow together."

After replying appropriately, making a particular point of the great honor his visit did me, I hear Baron Pittoni asking me to excuse him for not having gone to call on me, assuring me that it had slipped his mind, and a handsome old man asking His Excellency to persuade me to come to dinner at his house with him, though he had not the honor of knowing me.

"What!" Signor Zaguri said to him, "Casanova has been in this small city for ten days, and the Venetian Consul does not know him?"

"It is my fault," I said very quickly. "I thought I should insult him by going to make my bow to him, since the Consul might consider me contraband merchandise."

He replied wittily that from then on he would consider me merchandise which was in Trieste only under quarantine before returning to its country, and that his house would always be open to me, as the Venetian Consul's had been in Ancona.

By this answer the Consul intended to inform me that he knew all about me. His name was Marco Monti.[17] He was a man full of intelligence and experience, very amiable in company, making very amusing remarks, very eloquent, graceful in narrative, and always giving his stories a turn which made his listeners laugh, and at the same time having the gift of not laughing himself at what he was narrating and deliberately making ridiculous. Since I had something of the same gift myself, we were instantly on good terms, becoming rivals in the art of anecdote. Though he had the advantage of me by thirty years, I was a not unworthy match for him, and when we were together at gatherings there was no need for play to pass the time. This worthy man's friendship, which I was able to win, was extremely useful to me during the two years I spent there,[18] and I have always believed that he contributed greatly to my obtaining a pardon, the one object of my wishes at that time, for I was attacked by the malady which the Germans call Heimweh, "return." The Greeks called it nostalgia.[19] Its power is so great that the Swiss and the Slavonians die of it in a very short time. I might not have died of it if I had treated it with scorn, and I should not have gone to waste nine years in the ungrateful bosom of my stepmother.[20]

So I dined with Signor Zaguri at the Consul's with a numerous company, and the next day at the Governor's, who was a Count Auersperg.[21] This visit from a Venetian Avogador made me a personage entitled to the greatest consideration. I could no longer be regarded as an exile. I was treated as a man whom the Venetian Government itself could not demand, for, having left my country only to escape from an illegal imprisonment, the Government, none of whose laws I had broken, could not consider me guilty.

On the next morning but one I accompanied Signor Zaguri to Görz, where he stayed for three days, since he could not refuse the honors which the very distinguished nobility of that city wanted to accord him. I was included in all their invitations to him, and I saw that a foreigner in Görz could live there in great freedom and enjoy all the pleasures of society. There I made the acquaintance of a Count Cobenzl,[22] who may still be alive, wise, generous, and a man of wide reading without the least pretension; he gave a formal dinner for Signor Zaguri, and it was there that I was introduced to four ladies in every respect worthy of all homage. I made the acquaintance of Count Torres,[23] whose father, a Lieutenant-General in the Imperial service, was Spanish. He had taken a wife at the age of sixty, and, having married a woman as prolific as she was intelligent, he had five children all as ugly as himself. His daughter, who had been very well brought up, was very attractive despite her ugliness, for in intelligence and character she resembled her mother. The eldest son, who squinted, was so intelligent that it made him a fool. A libertine, a swaggerer, an inveterate liar, never mincing his words, malicious, a gossip, his company was sought because he told stories well, he said witty things, and he made people laugh. If he had studied he would have been a great scholar, for his memory was prodigious. It was he who vainly guaranteed the contract[24] I made with the printer Valerio de' Valeri to publish my History of the Troubles in Poland. During those two days I also made the acquaintance of a Count Coronini,[25] who had made a name for himself in the Journal des Savants[26] by publishing essays on diplomacy which he wrote in Latin. No one read them; people preferred according him the name of scholar for nothing to taking the trouble to read them.

I made the acquaintance of a young gentleman, Morelli,[27] who had written a history of Görz and who was then about to publish the first volume of it. He gave me the manuscript, asking me to read it at my leisure in Trieste and to correct what needed correcting, and I did it for him. I returned it to him after finding nothing to criticize in it, and thus I gained his friendship. He would have liked me less if I had taken the trouble to write critical remarks on it separately. I became a great friend of Count Karl Coronini,[28] who had every talent. He was an only son. Having married in the Netherlands a woman with whom he could not live, he had retired to his estate, where he amused himself pursuing little love affairs, hunting, and reading the political and literary news of the day. He laughed at those who said that there was not a happy man on earth, whereas he was happy and he was sure that he was so because he felt it. He was right; but he died of an apostem[29] of the head at the age of thirty-five years. The pains which killed him will have taught him better. Besides, it is not true either that there is a man in the world who feels happy at every hour, or that there is one who always feels unhappy. Whether happiness or unhappiness is more or less cannot be judged, for each is relative and depends upon character, temperament, and circumstances. Nor is it true that virtue makes a man happy, for there are virtues the practice of which brings suffering, and all suffering excludes happiness.

I accompanied the charming Zaguri as far as the border, together with Baron Pittoni, and I returned to Trieste with him. The Abate Pini,[30] an ecclesiastical advocate well versed in the dissolution of marriages, was with the amiable Venetian whose coming set the tone for all the courtesies which the society of Trieste showed me until I left. In three or four days Pittoni introduced me at every house, and at the Casino, to which no one could go except the select of the city. The Casino was in the inn at which I was staying. The woman who struck me was a Lutheran Venetian, the daughter of a German banker and the wife of David Büchelin,[31] a Swabian man of business established in Trieste. Pittoni was in love with her, and remained so until her death. Like Petrarch his Laura, he loved her for twelve years, always sighing, always hoping, and never obtaining anything. This rare woman, whose baptismal name was Zanetta, and whose husband was not jealous, was pretty, sang very well, accompanying herself on the harpsichord, and did the honors of her house to perfection; but the sweetness of her character and the evenness of her temper distinguished her even more than all the other gifts which Nature and education had bestowed on her. I needed no more than three days to discover that the woman was unconquerable, and, though vainly, I gave due warning of it to poor Baron Pittoni, whom she always distinguished above all her other suitors, though never straying from the conjugal fidelity which she had promised to her husband and, far more inviolably, to herself. She did not enjoy good health, but one would have found it hard to believe it of her if everyone in the city had not known it. She died young, very peacefully.

A few days after Signor Zaguri left, I received a note from the Consul telling me that His Excellency the Procurator Morosini[32] had arrived in Trieste during the night and was lodging at my inn. He was informing me of this, he said, because, if I knew him, I should seize the opportunity to pay my court to him. I was greatly obliged to my dear Consul for giving me this advice, for Signor Morosini was very much of a bigwig, both because of his eminent station as Procurator of San Marco and because it had become his turn to be a Savio Grande.[33] He had known me from my boyhood, and my reader may remember that in the year 1750 he had presented me to the Maréchal de Richelieu at Fontainebleau[34] when the self-styled Signora Querini was there to make a conquest of Louis XV.

So I quickly dressed as if I were to appear before a monarch, and I went to his anteroom to have myself announced, telling him who I was in a note. He came out of his room to receive me, and he expressed his pleasure in seeing me in the most gracious terms. When he learned for what reason I was staying in Trieste, and my desire to return to my country after so many vicissitudes, he assured me that he would do everything in his power to obtain me that favor from the redoubtable Tribunal, from which he thought that a subject like myself could ask it after seventeen years. He thanked me for looking after his nephew in Florence,[35] and he kept me with him all that day, which I spent giving him a detailed account of the principal adventures which had befallen me in my lifetime. Delighted to learn that Signor Zaguri was prepared to do everything for me, he told me to write to him that they should lay plans together, and he most cordially recommended me to the Consul, who, constantly writing to the Secretary of the Tribunal of the State Inquisitors, was delighted to be able to inform him of the marks of esteem which the Procurator had bestowed on me, at the same time letting him know that he himself was under an obligation to treat me with the greatest consideration.

After Signor Morosini left, I began to enjoy life in Trieste as I needed to if I was to stay there for any considerable length of time and in accordance with the economy which I must practice, for my only certain income was fifteen zecchini a month. So I never played cards, and at dinnertime I went every day to take pot luck at the houses of those who had invited me once and for all and who I was sure would enjoy my company. They were the Venetian Consul, the French Consul,[36] who was eccentric but a man of honor and who had a good cook, Pittoni, and a number of others; as for the pleasure of love, I sought out young girls of no consequence, thus spending very little and running no risk to my health.

It was toward the end of the Carnival that, at a ball given in the theater after the play, a masker dressed as Harlequin introduced me to his Harlequiness. They played pranks on me, and, the Harlequiness having interested me, I wanted very much to make her acquaintance. After a great many fruitless inquiries, Monsieur de Saint-Sauveur, the French Consul, told me that the Harlequin was a young lady of rank, and the Harlequiness a handsome youth, and that if I wished he would introduce me to the family of the Harlequin, who, dressed in girl's clothes, would interest me much more than her young male companion. In the course of the pranks they played on me until the end of the ball, I politely and decently convinced myself that the Consul had not deceived me in regard to the false Harlequin, and, curious to see her face, I demanded that he keep his promise on the second day of Lent. Thus it was that I made the acquaintance of Signora Leo,[37] a clever woman who had led a fast life but who was still attractive. She had a husband, an only son, and six daughters, all rather pretty; but the one who particularly pleased me was the Harlequin.[38] I fell in love with her, but, being thirty years older than she, and having begun by showing her only a fatherly fondness, a sense of shame which was something entirely new in my character prevented me from doing anything to convince her that my affection was that of a lover, so I never asked anything of her which went beyond the limits which may be considered the boundary line between the two feelings.

After Easter of the year 1773 the Governor of Trieste, Count Auersperg, was summoned to Vienna, and Count Wagensperg[39] came to take his place. His eldest daughter, Countess Lantieri,[40] who was as beautiful as a star, kindled a fire in my soul which would have made me unhappy if I had not had the strength to hide it under the veil of a great respect. I celebrated the new Governor's arrival in some verses which I published,[41] and, enumerating the virtues of the father, I praised the daughter's rare qualities. My homage pleased them, I began paying assiduous court to them, the Count-Governor took a liking to me, and proved it by confidences which he intended I should use to forward my own affairs. He did not tell me so, but it was easy to guess what he had in mind.

The Consul told me that he had been vainly trying for years to persuade the Government of Trieste to allow the diligence which made the journey between Mestre and that city once a week to lengthen it only one stage[42] by passing through Udine, the capital of Venetian Friuli. Its going through Udine, he said,[43] would be of great advantage to the commerce of the two States,[44] and the Council of Trieste would not agree to it for a reason as specious as it was irrelevant. The members of the Commercial Council of Trieste, all of them profound political schemers, said that if the Republic of Venice was so much in favor of the thing it was the clearest proof that it would be of advantage to it, and that, if that were so, it could not but be disadvantageous to the people of Trieste. The Consul assured me that if I could get the thing done I should so ingratiate myself with the Inquisitors that, if it did not obtain me a pardon, I should at least have earned their consideration, and that I should trust to his friendship for guidance in the matter as well as for his reporting my efforts in terms which would give me all the credit I should deserve from them. I replied that I would think it over.

I let no grass grow under my feet before I broached the matter to the Count-Governor, who, being acquainted with it, assured me that he considered the stubbornness of the Commercial Council scandalous; but he added that there seemed to be nothing he could do about it, for the decision did not lie with him. He told me that Councilor Rizzi[45] was the most pig-headed of them, and indeed was the one whose sophisms led all the others to think as he did. He advised me to submit a memorandum to him, in which, treating the subject from every point of view, I should prove that by going through Udine the diligence would be of much greater advantage to Trieste, which was a free port,[46] than to Udine,[47] whose commerce was very small. He said that he would send my memorandum to the Council without saying who had submitted it to him, and that, asserting that he was convinced himself, he would lay it on the dissenting Councilors to refute my arguments by convincing reasons, and he assured me that he would say in full Council that, if the thing was not done, he would send the memorandum to Vienna with his recommendation.

Seeing that I was on sure ground, I wrote a memorandum to which no one could reply except by tergiversating. The Council decreed that in future the diligence should pass through Udine both going and returning, and it was to me that Count Wagensperg gave the copy of their decree. I at once took it to the Consul, and, following his advice, I wrote the Secretary of the Tribunal that I considered myself fortunate to have succeeded in giving the Tribunal a proof of my eagerness to be useful to my country and worthy to be granted the favor of being allowed to return to it when Their Excellencies should decide that I had finally deserved it.

The Governor did not publish the new decree concerning the diligence until a week later, so the Government of Udine learned from the Tribunal that the thing was done before the city of Trieste was informed of it. It was thought that the Tribunal, which does everything secretly, had accomplished it by dint of money. The Secretary did not answer me, but he wrote the Consul a letter, which he showed me, in which he ordered him to give me an honorarium of a hundred silver ducati, which is equal to four hundred francs in French currency. He told him that it was to encourage me, and that I could hope for everything from the clemency of the Tribunal if I could resolve the great problem of the Armenians,[48] of which the Consul could give me the details.

He set it forth to me in a quarter of an hour, and I at first thought I could not resolve it; but I was not ready to despair; nothing, I told myself, is beyond hope.

Four Armenian monks had deserted [49] from the Monastery of San Lazzaro in Venice, tired of suffering under the tyranny of their Abbot. They had very rich relatives in Constantinople, and, making light of the excommunication which their Abbot had fulminated against them, calling them apostates, they had gone to Vienna to ask for asylum and protection, promising to be useful to the State by setting up a press which would supply books in Armenian to all the monasteries of Armenians established in the vast domains of the Turkish Empire. They undertook to expend the sum of a million florins in whatever place Their Imperial and Royal Majesties of Austria would permit them to settle both to establish their press on a large scale and to buy or build a house in which they proposed to live in community, though they were without a head. The Austrian Government not only acceded to their request at once but also granted them privileges. It was a matter of ousting Venice from her place in this branch of commerce and giving it to Austria. The Cabinet in Vienna hit upon the idea of sending them to Trieste with a strong recommendation to the Governor, and they had been there for six months. The State Inquisitors justifiably wanted to make them return to Venice, and, having failed to accomplish it by direct means, that is, through the action of their Abbot, who had offered them great compensations, they were using all secret means to raise obstacles to them in Trieste which would discourage them from remaining there. The Consul told me sincerely that he had declined to undertake the business because he had thought it impossible, and he predicted that if I undertook it I should waste my time.

It was certain that in a matter of this nature I could not count on the Governor's friendship, and that I must not even mention it to him or give him any reason to suspect that I would try to make the monks abandon their project, for, aside from his duty, his particularly zealous interest in forwarding the commerce of Trieste impelled him to do all that he could to make the monks succeed in their project. Despite all this, I began by striking up an acquaintance with them on the pretext of going to see their Armenian types,[50] which they had already had cast, and a stock of precious stones and minerals which had come to them from Constantinople. In a week or ten days I became intimate with them. One day I said to them that, if only to free themselves from their excommunication, their honor demanded that they return to the obedience they had vowed to their Abbot. The most obstinate of them replied that he was sure that their Patriarch,[51] absolving them from their excommunication, would give them a head, and that a number of monks would come from the Levant to found a new monastery in Trieste. Another day I asked them what conditions they would impose on their former Abbot as the price of returning to Venice; and the most reasonable of them replied that their first condition would be that the Abbot should recover the four hundred thousand ducati which he had entrusted to the Marchese Serpos[52] at four per cent interest.

The four hundred thousand ducati constituted the capital of the Monastery of San Lazzaro, where the Armenian Basilians had been established for three centuries.[53] It was the nation which had raised the capital; the Abbot could not dispose of it even with the consent of the majority of his monks. If the Marchese Serpos went bankrupt, the monastery would be left destitute. Yet it was true that the Abbot had transferred the amount to him on his own authority.

The Marchese Serpos was an Armenian merchant, established in Venice, who dealt entirely in precious stones; he was an intimate friend of the Abbot.

I then asked the monks what their other conditions would be, and they replied that they concerned only discipline and would give rise to no difficulties which could not be settled; but they said that they would put them all in writing when I could assure them that the Marchese Serpos was no longer in possession of their capital.

So began my negotiations; I wrote everything down, I gave the Consul my memorandum, which he sent to the Tribunal, and six weeks later I received the answer that the Abbot would find means to deposit the amount in question in a bank, but that he wanted first to know exactly what the matters of discipline were.

When I read this counterproposal, which was in direct contradiction to what I had written, for the parties were completely at odds, I determined to abandon the business.

But what impelled me to get rid of it very quickly was a few words which Count Wagensperg said to me.[54] He gave me to understand that he knew I was trying to reconcile the monks with their Abbot, and that he regretted it, for I could not succeed except by harming the country in which I was living and which I should treat as a friend, for it treated me as such. At that I immediately told him in all sincerity just where the matter stood, assuring him that I should never have entered into negotiating it if I had not been inwardly certain that I should never succeed, for I had learned directly from Venice that there was absolutely no doubt that the Marchese Serpos could not return the four hundred thousand ducati to the Abbot. He understood my position. The Armenians bought Councilor Rizzi's house for thirty thousand florins and went to live in it; I went to see them from time to time, but never again spoke to them about returning to Venice. But now for the last proof of his friendship which Count Wagensperg gave me, for he died that autumn at the age of fifty years.

One morning he stopped after reading a long memorandum which he had just received from Vienna, and he said he was sorry I did not understand German, for he would give it to me to read.

"Here is the substance of it," he said, "and a way to make you honored in your country at no risk of displeasing those whose official position obliges them to secure every possible advantage to our commerce. I am going to confide something to you which you must never say you learned from me, but which can be of great profit to you whether you succeed or fail in your efforts, for your patriotism will be appreciated, the diligence with which you communicate the matter will earn you thanks, and your cleverness in discovering the thing will be set to your credit. At the same time, there will be no need for you to say how you discovered it. Say no more than that you would not communicate it if you were not certain of it.

"All merchandise," he went on, "which is sent from our country to Lombardy goes through the Venetian State, and through Venice itself, where, after having passed through the customs, it is placed in warehouses as merchandise in transit. This has always been the case, it is so now, and it can be so in the future if the Venetian Government will make up its mind to diminish by at least one half what it makes us pay for storing our goods. The four per cent it makes us pay is too much. A project has been presented to the Court, which has immediately approved it, and here is the order I have received to execute it without even notifying the Venetian Government beforehand, for the operation is not such that we consider it our duty, as a friendly Power, to communicate it before putting it into execution. In the matter of shipment, every State is free; if it ships through, it pays; if it does not ship through, the place it avoids can neither demand anything of it nor complain if it ships through some other place. Such is the present case. In future whatever we send to Lombardy will no longer pass through the Venetian State. Everything will be put on board here, and will be taken to La Messola[55] to be unloaded. That port, which belongs to the Duke of Modena, is opposite to us. The Gulf is crossed in a night, and our merchandise will be stored there in warehouses which we shall build at once. You see that we shorten the voyage by more than half, and that the State of Modena will demand only the usual small toll, which does not come to a quarter of what we pay the Venetians. Add to that the smaller costs for cartage, and also the time we save. I am certain that if the Republic will inform the Minister of Finance or the Council of Commerce in Vienna that she is ready to diminish the amount she demands by a half, the offer will be eagerly accepted, for new things are always attended by difficulties, demand extraordinary expenditures, and are subject to irregularities due to events which are not foreseen. I will not present this matter to the Council for three or four days yet, for there is no hurry; but it is you who should hurry, for as soon as I make the thing public the Venetian Government will immediately be informed of it by your Consul, and the whole corporation of merchants by their correspondents. I should like to have you be the cause of my receiving an order from Vienna to suspend the operation just when I am about to put it into effect."

I at once saw how greatly it would conduce to my credit if I should be the first to convey this news to the State Inquisitors. Their foible is to astonish by knowing everything before anyone else by means which can never be guessed. After returning His Excellency all the thanks I owed him, I told him I would go to write a report on the matter, which I would send to the State Inquisitors by express messenger after giving it to him to read. He said he would be very glad to read it, which greatly pleased me.

I did not dine that day. In five or six hours I got through everything—draft, copy, and second copy—and I took it all to the Governor, who was delighted by my promptness. He declared it excellent. It was then that I took my report to the Consul. Looking at me in astonishment, he asked me if I was sure it was not all a myth, for he thought it impossible that such a piece of news could have escaped his knowledge and that of all Trieste. I thereupon assured him, as I had written at the end of my report, that I staked my life on the truth of it, at the same time asking him not to insist on my telling him how I had come to know of it. After thinking it over carefully, he said that my report, if it was to be sent by him, would have to go to the Magistracy of the five Savi alla Mercanzia,[56] since, as Consul, he was its agent, and that in consequence he could send it to the State Inquisitors only if I expressly demanded that he do so. So he told me to deliver it to him sealed, and to write him a polite note in which I requested him to send my packet to the Tribunal, asking him to excuse me for not sending it to him unsealed.

"Why," I asked him, "do you want me to show this lack of confidence in your good faith?"

"Because otherwise I should have to vouch for the truth of the thing, and, then too, if I were aware that it was true, the five Savi alla Mercanzia would have reason to blame me, for I am here to serve them, rather than Their Excellencies the State Inquisitors, to whom I owe nothing. So permit me to insist on remaining ignorant of the matter until it comes to my ears as public knowledge. It seems to me that, if it is true, His Excellency the President[57] must know of it, and that before the week is out it will no longer be a secret. Thereupon I will make my report to the five Savi alla Mercanzia, and my duty will be done."

"Then I could send my memorandum directly to your Magistracy, without sending it through you?"

"No. For in the first place you would not be believed. In the second place it would injure me, for, when I transmitted the news, I should be accused of negligence. In the third place my dear master the Magistracy would not give you a copper, and perhaps would not even thank you. If you are certain of this strange novelty, you will play a master stroke by sending it to the Tribunal, and you are sure not only to gain great credit but a fresh reward in money, which should assure you of your credit. If the thing is true I congratulate you with all my heart, but if it is an invention you are ruined, for you lead the redoubtable and infallible Tribunal to make a strange blunder, you can be sure that an hour after the Tribunal is informed of the thing the Magistracy of the five Savi alla Mercanzia will have a copy of it."

"Why a copy?"

"Because you name yourself; and no one is allowed to know the names of Their Excellencies' confidenti."[58]

I did everything that my wise friend advised me to do, and I instantly wrote him the note for which he had asked, I sealed my report in a cover, addressing it to Signor Marcantonio Businello,[59] Secretary to the Tribunal, who was the brother of the one under whose reign I had escaped from the Leads, seventeen years earlier.

The President was pleased the next morning when I told him that I had done everything before midnight. He assured me again that the Venetian Consul should know nothing about the matter until Saturday. But my dear Consul's uneasiness during the five days which passed before the thing became known distressed me: his delicacy kept him from saying anything to me, and on my side I was sorry that I could not reassure his noble soul.

On Saturday when the session of the Council ended, it was Councilor Rizzi who told me the news at the Casino, announcing it as most disadvantageous to Venice, which delighted him, for he claimed that the port of Trieste would very soon reduce the port of Venice to nothing.[60] The Consul arrived while we were still discussing the news; he said that the loss to Venice was only a small matter, but that at the first shipwreck in crossing the Gulf all that the tax for storage cost in ten years would be lost. He said further that the German shippers would lose all that the cartage would cost them for goods which would have to travel back again from La Messola to Venetian Lombardy, and to all our fairs. In short the Consul simply made light of it. His office demanded that he do so. In all small commercial cities like Trieste trifles are magnified out of all proportion.

I went to dine with the Consul, who, when he was at last alone with me, unburdened his soul and confessed all his doubts and fears. On my asking him what he thought the Venetians would do to turn away the blow, he said that they would hold great discussions, after which they would decide on nothing, leaving the Austrian Government to send its merchandise by whatever route it pleased.

And in fact the Consul's prediction was verified. He wrote the news to his Magistracy the same day, and the following week he was told in reply that Their Excellencies had learned of the thing some days earlier through private channels, and that he was to continue to inform the Magistracy of the consequences. It was not until three weeks later that he received a letter from the Secretary of the Tribunal in which he ordered him to give me an honorarium of a hundred silver ducati and to allow me ten zecchini a month to encourage me to deserve well of the Tribunal. It was then that I had no more doubt that I should be granted a pardon before the end of the year; but I was mistaken. I did not receive it until the year following, and I shall speak of it when that time comes. My circumstances were now easy. What I had of my own was not enough to live on, for certain pleasures of which I could not deprive myself cost me a great deal. I was not displeased to find myself in the pay of the same Tribunal which had deprived me of my freedom and whose power I had defied; on the contrary, I felt that I was the victor, and my honor demanded that I make myself useful to it in anything which did not infringe the Law of Nature and the Law of Nations.

A little incident which made the city of Trieste laugh will not fail to amuse my readers. It was at the beginning of the summer; I had just eaten some sardines at the seaside, and I returned to my lodging two hours before midnight. I was about to go to bed, when I see a girl enter my room whom I at once recognize as the maidservant of young Count Strasoldo.[61]

The young Count was handsome, poor, like almost all the Strasoldos, fond of expensive pleasures, and hence in debt; his post brought him only six hundred florins a year, and he spent four times as much. He was polite and generous, and I had several times supped at his house with Pittoni. He had in his service a Carniolan[62] girl of the greatest beauty, whom his friends saw but whom none of them dared to approach, for they knew that he was in love with her and jealous. Bowing to the circumstances, I had seen her, admired her, and praised her in her master's presence, congratulating him on possessing such a treasure; but I had never said so much as a word to her.

Count Strasoldo had been summoned to Vienna by Count Auersperg, who was fond of him and who when he left had promised to keep him in mind. He was to be employed in Poland as Captain of a District;[63] he had taken leave of everyone, he had sold his furniture at auction, and he was on the verge of leaving. Everyone in Trieste knew that he was taking his Carniolan beauty with him; that very morning I had gone to wish him a good journey. So the reader can imagine how surprised I must have been to see his maidservant, who had scarcely even looked at me, in my room at such an hour. I ask her what she wants, and she tells me in a few words that, not wanting to leave with Strasoldo, and not knowing where she could go to hide, she had thought that she could nowhere be as safe as in my room. No one, she said, could guess that she was there, and Strasoldo would set off alone. After he was gone she would at once leave Trieste and go home; she hoped that I would not be cruel enough to send her away; she assured me she would leave the next morning, for Strasoldo was to set off at daybreak, as I should be able to see from my window.

"Charming Lenzica" (such was her name), "you are not a girl to be sent away by anyone, least of all by me, who have always thought you adorable. You are safe here, and I give you my word that no one shall enter this room as long as you are in it. I thank my good fortune which made you think of me; but if it is true that, as everyone says, the Count is in love with you, you'll see that he will not leave. He will stay here at least all of tomorrow looking for you."

"He will look for me everywhere except here. Will you promise me that you will not make me leave this room even if the devil tells him I am here?"

"I give you my word of honor for it a hundred times over. You understand, I hope, that you cannot avoid sharing my bed?"

"Alas! If I shall not be a burden to you, I consent to it."

"Be a burden to me, you say? You shall see. So, my charming Lenzica, go and undress. Where are all your belongings?"

"Everything I have is in a small trunk which has already been tied to the carriage, but I don't care about that."

"He must be in a fury at this moment."

"He will not come back until midnight. He is supping with Signora Bissolotti,[64] who is in love with him."

So saying, she got into bed, and, after eight months of abstinence, I spent a delicious night. After Leah I had had only casual pleasures which lasted but a quarter of an hour and on which I did not congratulate myself afterward. Lenzica was so perfect a beauty that, if I had been rich, I would have set myself up in a house in order to keep her in my service. We did not wake until seven o'clock, when she got up and, seeing the carriage at Strasoldo's door, she said to me sadly that I had guessed right. I comforted her, assuring her again that she was free to stay with me as long as she pleased. I was sorry not to have a closet, for I could not hide her from the waiter who would have brought us coffee. We had to go without breakfast. I needed to think of some way to bring her food, but I had plenty of time. But there was a surprise in store for me. At ten o'clock I saw Strasoldo enter the inn with his intimate friend Pittoni. I go out into the hall, and I see them both talking to my landlord.

Then I see them go into the Casino and afterward enter and leave a number of apartments on every floor; I see what must be afoot, and I laughingly tell Lenzica that they are looking for her and that they will certainly come to pay us a visit; she urges me to keep my promise, and I reassure her. I understand very well that I cannot keep them from entering my room without giving them reason to guess the truth.

I hear them coming, and at that I go out and close my door, asking them to excuse me if I could not let them enter, for I had a piece of contraband.

"Only tell me," said Strasoldo in a pitiable voice, "that you haven't got my Carniolan in your room. We are certain that she entered the inn at ten o'clock last night; the guard at the door saw her."

"Very well. She is in my room, and I have given her my word that no one shall use violence on her. And you can be sure that I will keep it"

"I don't want violence used on her either; but I am sure that she will come with me of her own free will if I can talk with her."

"I will see if she is willing. Wait outside here."

She had heard everything. She told me that I could bring them in. She was the first to speak, proudly asking Strasoldo if she had contracted any obligation to him, if he could accuse her of having robbed him, in short if she was not free to leave him. He gently replied that, on the contrary, it was he who owed her a year's wages, and that he had her trunk with her belongings, but that she was wrong to leave him for no reason as she was doing.

"The reason," she replied, "is my will. I do not want to go to Vienna. I have been telling you so for a week. If you are a man of honor you will leave me my trunk, and, as for my wages, if you have no money now you can send them to me at Laibach[65] in care of my aunt."

Strasoldo then put an end to my pitying him, for after descending to the most groveling entreaties, he burst into tears. It disgusted me. But I was very near to losing patience when Pittoni told me I ought to turn the hussy out of my room. I said to him firmly that it was not for him to teach me my duty, and that I did not agree that the girl was a hussy. Changing his tone, he began to laugh and asked me if I could possibly have fallen in love with her in the short space of a night. Strasoldo interrupted him to say he was sure she had not slept with me, and she told him he was mistaken, for there was only one bed.

Toward noon they left, and poor Lenzica could not find words enough to thank me. The need for secrecy being thus ended, I had dinner for two sent up, and, the carriage still being there, I promised that I would stay with her and never go out so long as Strasoldo remained in Trieste.

At three o'clock the Venetian Consul came to tell me that Strasoldo had come to him and implored his good offices to persuade me to give him back Lenzica. I told him that it was to her that he should address himself, and, when he had heard the whole story, he left, saying that we were both in the right. Toward nightfall a porter brought the girl's trunk to my room; at which I saw that she was touched but still firm in her resolve. She supped and slept with me for a second night, and Strasoldo left at daybreak. I then hired a carriage and I escorted my dear Lenzica two stages on the road to Laibach, where, after eating a good dinner with her, I left her in the house of a woman whom she knew. Everyone in Trieste declared that I had acted well, and even Pittoni said that in my place he would have done no differently. But poor Strasoldo came to a bad end. He had a post in Leopol, he got into debt there, and he was sentenced for misappropriation of funds. To save his head he escaped to Turkish territory, where he took the turban.

The Venetian Proveditor General of Palmanova,[66] who was a patrician of the Rota family, came to Trieste at this time to pay a visit to the President-Governor Count

Wagensperg; the Procurator Erizzo[67] was with him. In the afternoon the Governor presented me to Their Excellencies from Venice, who seemed surprised to see me in Trieste. The Procurator asked me if I was managing to enjoy myself as much as I had done in Paris sixteen years earlier;[68] I replied that sixteen years more and a hundred thousand francs less had perforce made me a different man. The Consul came in to tell them that the felucca was ready, and Signora Lantieri, seconded by her father the Count, said that I could be of the party; the three noble Venetians who were there, the third of whom I did not know, said together that I must be of it. After making a bow which meant neither yes nor no, I ask the Consul what this party on a felucca might be. He replied that we were going on board a Venetian warship which was at anchor in the mouth of the harbor, and of which His Excellency, whom I saw there, was the commander. I then told the charming Countess, with a modest smile, that an earlier engagement prevented me from paying my court to her on this pleasant occasion.

"I am forbidden, Signora, to set foot on Venetian territory."

There was a chorus of oh's and ah's.

"You have nothing to fear. You are with us. We are men of honor. Indeed, your suspicion is a trifle insulting."

"That is all to the good," I said to them,[69] "and I will comply, provided that one of Your Excellencies will assure me that the State Inquisitors will not know, and perhaps no later than tomorrow, that I had the boldness to make one of this delightful party, which of course is the greatest honor to me."

At that I saw them all dumb, looking at one another, and no one insisted any longer. The noble commander of the ship, who did not know me, then approached, and they spent five or six minutes talking together in low voices.

The next day the Consul told me that the commander of the ship had thought it extremely prudent on my part to refuse to join the party, for if he had chanced to be told my name and my complaints while I was on board his ship he would not have let me leave. When I repeated what the Consul had told me to the Governor of Trieste he gravely replied that he would not have allowed the vessel to leave. The Procurator Erizzo told me that evening that I had done very well, and that he would see that the Tribunal was informed of it.

During those days in Trieste I saw one of the most beautiful of the Venetian women who were then much talked about. She had come there with a party of her admirers, on pleasure bound. She was by birth a Venetian lady of the Bon family, and she was the wife of Count Romili,[70] of Bergamo, who allowed her complete freedom, at the same time being her intimate friend. She was dragging behind her chariot an old gout-ridden General, Count Burghausen,[71] a famous libertine and spendthrift, who had forsaken Mars ten years earlier in order more freely to devote the remainder of his life to Venus. Very gay and full of experience, he remained in Trieste after the rest of the party had gone; he insisted on making my acquaintance, and ten years later he did me a service, as my reader will see in the next volume, which will perhaps be the last.

CHAPTER X

Adventures in Trieste. I do the Tribunal of the Venetian State Inquisitors good service. My journey to Görz and my return to Trieste. I renew my acquaintance with Irene, become an actress and a skilled gamester.

ABOUT THAT time the ladies of Trieste wanted to see how well they could do in the way of acting French comedy, and they put me in charge of everything, leaving it to me not only to choose both the plays and the actors and actresses but also to distribute the parts. It was a task which cost me a great deal of effort and did not yield me the pleasures for which I had hoped. They were all novices in the art of the theater, I had to train them, go to see them all every day to rehearse them in their parts, which they were to learn by heart; but since they were never able to fix them in their memories properly I had to resign myself to serving them as prompter. I very soon learned all the woes by which that occupation is beset. The prompter is in the most ungrateful of positions, the actors never admit their obligations to him and, when they stumble, always blame him for it. A physician in Spain is treated no better; if his patient gets well it is by the protection of some saint, if he dies it is the physician's remedies which killed him. A Negress who was in the service of the prettiest of my actresses, to whom I showed great attentions, made one of those observations which it is not easy to forget.

"I don't understand," she said to me one day, "how you can be so much in love with my mistress when she is as white as the devil."

I asked her if she had never loved a white man, and she replied that she had, but it was because she had never encountered a Negro, whom she would certainly have preferred. A few months later the African maidservant, yielding to my urging, granted me her favors; on that occasion I learned the falsity of the maxim which says that sublata lucerna nullum discrimen inter feminas ("when the lamp is taken away, all women are alike").[1] Even with the lamp taken away, one cannot but know whether a woman is black or white. Negroes are of a different species, there is no doubt of it; they have the peculiarity that their women, if they have been taught, are able not to conceive, or even to conceive males or females as they choose. If my reader does not believe this he is in the right, for in creatures of our nature the thing is incredible, but he would be convinced of it, as I am, if I instructed him in the theory of it.[2]

Count Rosenberg,[3] Grand Chamberlain to the Emperor and later created a Prince, who died last year, came to Trieste at that time on pleasure bent, accompanied by the Abate Casti,[4] whose acquaintance I wanted to make because of two or three little poems, of unexampled impiety, which he had composed. I found him an ignoramus, brazen and shameless, whose only talent was a knack for versification. Count Rosenberg always took him with him because he needed him. He made him laugh, and he procured girls for him. In those days the pox had not yet eaten away his uvula. I have been told that he has now been made poet to the Emperor;[5] his succession to the post dishonors the memory of the great Metastasio, who had no vices and all the virtues; Casti has not one virtue and all the vices. As for his poetical ability, he possesses neither nobility of language nor any knowledge of the theater. Two or three comic operas[6] which he has produced prove it; they contain nothing but buffooneries badly strung together; and one of them is conspicuous only for its calumnies against both King Theodore[7] and the Republic of Venice, which he attempts to ridicule by lies. In another, called The Grotto of Trophonius,[8] he made himself the laughingstock of all men of letters, parading a far-fetched erudition which contributes nothing to the humor of his plot.

Among the people of rank who came from Görz to see the French plays, which were given in the house of Baron Königsbrunn,[9] whose charming wife, née Countess Attems, played the leading parts, I made the acquaintance of a Count Luigi Torriano,[10] who was able to persuade me to go to spend the autumn with him in a country house which he had six miles from Görz. If I had heeded my Genius, I would not have gone there. The Count was not yet thirty, and was unmarried. He was not handsome, but he could not be called ugly, despite his having the countenance of a gallows bird. In it one read cruelty, treachery, pride, and brutal sensuality. I also saw hate and jealousy in it. This dreadful mixture made me believe that I was mistaken. A gracious invitation seemed to me incompatible with the horrible characteristics which his face set before my eyes. Making inquiries about him before promising to go there, I heard nothing but good. I was told that he loved the fair sex, and that he became ferocious when he had to avenge himself on someone who had insulted him; but, considering these two qualities not unworthy of a gentleman, I promised him I would go there. He told me he would expect me in Görz on September 1st, and that we would leave the next day for Spessa, which was the name of his estate. So I took leave of everyone for a couple of months, and of Count Wagensperg, who was seriously ill with the disease which is easily cured by mercury when the physician knows how to administer it, but which becomes mortal when the patient falls into incompetent hands. The poor Count suffered that misfortune. He died a month after my departure.

I leave Trieste in the morning, I dine at Prosecco,[11] and I arrive at Count Luigi Torriano's house in Görz in good time; he was not there; but I am allowed to unload my few belongings when I say that the Count had invited me. I go out, I go to call on Count Torres,[12] I stay there until suppertime, then I return to the house of my new host. I am told that he had gone to the country and that he would be back the next day. I am told that my trunk has been taken to the post house inn,[13] where supper and a room had been ordered for me. This surprises me; but I go there, I find myself poorly lodged and poorly fed; but what of that? I conclude that he could not lodge me in his house, and, that being the case, he could not do otherwise. I blame him only for not having told me so. Could I suppose that a nobleman who has a house hasn't a room in it for a friend?

The next morning Count Luigi Torriano comes to see me, thanks me for my promptness, congratulates himself on the pleasure he will take in having me with him at Spessa, and tells me that he is only sorry that we cannot leave until the next day but one, because he is on the eve of the decision which was to be handed down in a suit he had against a rascally old farmer who had served him and who, being in his debt, not only refused to pay him but made claims himself. The case was to be argued the next day in the court of last appeal, which would render justice where it was due. I told the Count that I would go to hear the advocates, which would be an amusement for me. He left, not only without asking me where I should dine but without offering me the least excuse for having been unable to lodge me in his house. I think that perhaps according to his way of thinking I had been wrong simply to appear and expect to be lodged in his house. He had invited me to the country. I decide to overlook it all. It may have been from tact that he had said nothing to me about it, for if I had been in the wrong it would have been my part to ask him to excuse me.

I dine alone. I spend the afternoon making visits, I sup with Count Torres, I speak of the pleasure it will give me to hear the eloquence of the advocates of Görz the next day; and Torres tells me that he will be at the session too, for he is curious to see how Torriano will take it if the peasant wins.

"I am acquainted with the case," he went on, "and everyone knows that Torriano cannot lose unless the account book he has put in evidence, and according to which the peasant appears to be in debt to him, is forged. The peasant, on his side, cannot lose unless the Count's receipts are for the most part forged. The peasant has already lost in the two lower courts; but he has continued to appeal, paying the costs, and note that he is poor. If he loses tomorrow he is not only ruined but risks being sent to the galleys; but if he wins it will be a sad day for Torriano, for then it would be he who would deserve to go to the galleys, together with his advocate, who has already deserved it several times."

Since I knew that Emanuel Torres was a scandalmonger, his discourse had little weight with me, but my curiosity increased. So the next day I went to the courtroom, where I saw the judges, the opposing litigants, and their two advocates. The peasant's was old and looked honest. My host's looked like a bold-faced scoundrel. His client the Count was beside him, and had the scornful look and the sneer of the proud man who is willing for once so far to lower himself as to consolidate his victory over an upstart whom he had already twice defeated. The peasant was there with his wife, a son, and two daughters born to win every suit on earth. I was astonished that such a family could have lost twice. There they were, all four of them, shabbily dressed, keeping their eyes cast down, showing every sign of being the victims of oppression. Each advocate was allowed to speak for two hours.

The appealing advocate spoke on behalf of his peasant for only half an hour. He used it to lay before the judges the book of receipts authenticated by the Count's signatures down to the day when he had dismissed him because he would not let his daughters go to his house; and, continuing to speak with the utmost coolness, he showed the judges the book which the Count had put in evidence and according to which the peasant was in debt to him, and he proved that all the peasant's receipts had been declared forged by experts under oath. In addition he proved that there were anachronisms and parachronisms everywhere, and he ended by saying that his client was in a position, by proceeding in criminal court, to reveal the two forgers whom the Count had paid and who were the authors of the shamelessly fraudulent papers (scartafacci) which the opposing advocate had dared to present to the magistrate to deceive his good faith and ruin an honest family, whose only fault was poverty. He ended by demanding reimbursement of all the costs paid and to be paid, and compensation for loss of time and reputation.

The harangue by my dear Count's advocate would have lasted more than two hours if he had not been made to cut it short. There are no insults which he did not spew out against the other advocate, the experts, and the poor peasant, whom he more than once addressed directly, saying that he would go to look at him in the galleys, where no one would pity him. During these exchanges I should have been bored to death if I had been blind, for my only pleasure lay in watching the faces of the litigants and the audience. My dear host's face was always smiling and unafraid.

We all withdrew to an adjoining room to await the verdict. The peasant was in a corner with his family, shunned, distressed, with not a soul to speak a word to him, either in friendship or as a covert enemy. Count Torriano was surrounded by a dozen or more personages of distinction, all telling him that he could not lose; but that if anything so unlikely should happen he would have to pay, but at the same time making the peasant prove the alleged crime of forgery. I listened but said nothing. Torres, who was the sworn enemy of prudence, asked me what I thought. I replied that my dear Count ought to lose even if he were in the right, because of his advocate's shameless harangue.

An hour later the magistrate's clerk came in with two papers, one of which he gave to the peasant's advocate and the other to Count Torriano, who, after reading it, burst out laughing. He read it aloud. The court sentenced him to recognize the peasant as his creditor, to pay all the costs, and to give him a year's wages, all without prejudice to the peasant's right to appeal ad minimum on account of any other complaints he could bring before the court. The advocate appeared, looking gloomy, but Torriano consoled him by giving him six zecchini. Everyone left. I remained with him to ask him if he would appeal to Vienna, and he replied that his appeal would be of a different sort. I did not want to know more. We left Görz the next morning. When the innkeeper presented my account he said that Count Torriano had ordered him not to insist if I should decline to pay, for in that case he would pay for me himself. The revelation made me laugh. These three or four samples convinced me that I was going to spend six weeks with a dangerous eccentric.

We arrived at Spessa in less than two hours. It was a large house on a little hill, with nothing about its architecture to distinguish it. We went upstairs to his apartment, which was furnished neither well nor ill, and, after showing me all the others, he escorted me to mine, which was a room on the ground floor, badly furnished, poorly ventilated, and not very light. He told me that it had been the favorite room of his father,[14] who, like me, was fond of study, and that I could be sure that I should enjoy perfect quiet there, for I should never see anyone. We dined very late, so on that day there was no supper. I found the food and the wine tolerable, as was the company of a priest who served as the Count's steward and part of whose duty it was to eat with him when he was at Spessa. A thing which offended me was that, eating very fast, he made bold to tell me, though with a smile, that I ate too slowly. After dinner he said that he had a great deal to do, and that we should see each other the next day.

So I go to my room to put my papers in order. I was working on the second volume of my Troubles in Poland. Toward dusk I go out to ask for a light, and a manservant brings me a tallow candle. I think it disgraceful, for I was entitled to wax candles or an oil lamp, but I am discreet enough to say nothing. I only ask the servant if one of them had been ordered to wait on me; he replies that the Count had said nothing to them, but that of course they would be at my orders whenever I summoned them. It would have been a troublesome task, for to find them I should have had to leave the house and go around it by way either of the street or of the courtyard. I ask him who will take care of my room, and he says it will be the duty of the maidservant.

"Then she has another key?"

"There is no key; but to lock yourself in at night you have the bolt."

At that I wanted to laugh, for it was really intolerable; but I have the firmness to say nothing; the manservant leaves, I bolt my door, and I set to work; but after half an hour I have the bad luck to put out my candle in snuffing it; I laugh and curse, and I see that I am reduced to going to bed in the dark. The bed was good; which, as I did not expect it, soothes me a little, and I sleep perfectly well. In the morning I see no one. I dress, I lock up my papers, and, in nightcap and dressing gown, I go to wish my host good morning. I find him having his hair dressed by his second lackey, who served as his valet. After saying that I had slept well, I tell him I have come to breakfast with him. He replies politely enough that he never breakfasts, and not to trouble myself to call on him in the morning, for he was always busy with his peasants, who were all thieves.

"For your breakfast," he said, "since you take breakfast, I will send word to my cook to make coffee for you when you wish it."

"You will also be so good as to order your servant to dress my hair after he has attended to you."

"I am surprised that you have not a manservant of your own "

"If I could have foreseen that my small need of a servant who can dress hair in a village where there is no hairdresser, and in your house, could be an inconvenience to you, I should have procured one."

"It will not inconvenience me; but you may often lose patience waiting for him."

"I will gladly wait. A thing that I must have is a key to the door of my room, for I have papers for which I am responsible, and which I cannot lock up in my trunk every time I need to go out "

"Everything is safe in my house."

"So I suppose, but you must understand that it would be absurd in me to claim that you were responsible for a letter which I might find missing; it could be a great misfortune for me, and I certainly should not tell you about it "

He makes no answer, and after thinking for five or six minutes he tells his hairdresser-lackey to tell the priest to put a lock on the door of my room and give me the key to it. While he was thinking I notice on his night table a wax candle with a snuffer on it, and a book. I go to the table, asking him, of course, if I might see what reading beguiled him to sleep; he replies politely, but asking me not to touch the book. I promptly draw back, and I say with a laugh that I am sure it is a prayer book; but I swear I will tell no one of my suspicion. He replies, laughing too, that I had guessed rightly. I leave, asking him to send me his lackey when he has finished with him, and a cup of coffee or chocolate or broth.

Nettled by behavior such as I had never before experienced, and especially by the tallow candle while he used a wax one, I return to my wretched room, and I fall into serious reflections. My first impulse urged me to leave at once. Though I commanded only forty or fifty zecchini, I had as much courage as when I was rich. But I rejected that expedient, since I thought I could not execute it except by affronting him most signally. The one crying wrong being the tallow candle, I decided to ask the lackey if he had not been ordered to bring me wax ones; I had to do this, for the thing might be nothing but an oversight on the Friulian lackey's part. It was he who an hour later brought me a cup of coffee, poured out into the cup and sugared according to his taste. I burst out laughing, for I had either to laugh or to throw it in his face, I tell him that is not the way to serve coffee, and I leave it untouched, taking off my nightcap so that he could dress my hair. At the end of my patience, I ask him why he had brought me tallow and not wax. He modestly replies that the person who had charge of the wax candles was the priest, and that he had given him only one for his master. I make no answer. I think that the wretched priest may have thought it a sin against economy to give me wax, or had supposed that it would make no difference to me. I decide to question the priest that day.

As soon as I was dressed I go out for a stroll, and I come upon the priest with a locksmith. He tells me that, having no lock ready, he will put a padlock on my door and give me the key to it. I reply that it makes no difference, provided that I can lock my door, and I abandon my stroll and go back with him to watch the work. While the locksmith hammered away, I ask the priest why he had sent me a tallow candle and not one or two of wax. He replies that he would never have dared to do that without an express order from the Count.

"Doesn't that," I asked him, "go without saying?"

"Nothing goes without saying here. It is I who buy the wax candles, and he pays me for them with no fear of being cheated, for the candle is entered in the account each time he needs another one."

"Then you can let me have a pound of wax candles if I pay you what they cost you?"

"That's the least favor I can do you, but I warn you that I cannot avoid telling the Count about it, for you understand——"

"Yes, I understand perfectly, but I do not care."

I paid him for a pound of them; and I went for a walk, after learning from him that dinner was at one o'clock. But I was very much surprised when, returning at half past twelve, I was told that the Count had been at table since noon. Not knowing what could account for this accumulation of impertinences, I control myself again, and I go in, saying that the Abate had told me dinner was at one o'clock; he replies that so it is usually, but that, wanting to pay calls on his neighbors and present me to them, he had decided to dine at twelve; but that I should have time to dine nevertheless, and he orders the dishes which had been taken away brought back to the table. I make no reply, and I eat from what dishes were on the table, affecting good humor and refusing the soup, the boiled beef, and the ragouts which had been brought back. He urges me to help myself to them, he says he will wait; but in vain. I calmly reply that I always punished myself in this way when I committed the fault of arriving late at a nobleman's dinner.

However, concealing all my ill-humor, I get into his carriage with him to accompany him on the calls he wanted to make. He took me to the house of a neighbor who lived only half an hour away. He was Baron del Mestre,[15] who stayed there all year, who kept up a good establishment and had a numerous family, all high-spirited and likable. The Count spent the whole day there, putting off the other visits he meant to make until another day, and we returned to Spessa, where the priest, a half hour later, gave me back the money I had paid him for the pound of wax candles. He said that the Count had forgotten to tell him that I was to be served like himself. For better or worse, the slight was patched up; and I pretended to take his reparation at face value. When supper was served it proved to be as bountiful as if we had not dined, and, eating enough for four while the Count ate almost nothing, I congratulated him on his perspicacity.

The lackey who showed me to my room having asked me at what hour I wanted breakfast, I told him, and he observed it punctually. The coffee was in a coffeepot, and the sugar separate. The other lackey came to dress my hair, the maid came to tidy up my room, everything was changed. I thought I had taught him manners, and that I should have no more unpleasantness; but I was mistaken. Three or four days later the priest came to ask me at what hour I wanted to dine alone in my room.

"Why alone in my room?"

"Because the Count left for Görz yesterday after supper, saying that he did not know when he would return. He ordered me to have dinner served you in your room."

"I will dine at one o'clock."

Freedom is everyone's right, but I thought he ought to have told me that he was going to Görz. He remained there a week. Boredom would have driven me to despair if I had not gone on foot every day to spend two hours with Baron del Mestre. I was without company; the priest was an ignorant rustic; not even a pretty peasant girl; I thought I could not possibly have the stamina to spend four more weeks there.

When he came back I talked to him without mincing my words. I told him that I had gone to Spessa with him to keep him company and that, seeing that he had no need of it, I asked him to take me back to Görz the first time he went there, and to leave me there, for I was as fond of company as he was. He assured me that it would not happen again, and he told me he had gone there because he was in love with an actress in the opera buffa named Costa.[16] She had left Trieste expressly to see him, and good manners as well as his feelings had obliged him to spend the whole week she was in Görz with her. In addition he had signed a marriage contract with a young lady,[17] the daughter of a castellan of Venetian Friuli, whom he would marry during the coming Carnival. All these reasons persuaded me to stay on with the eccentric Count.

His entire estate consisted in vineyards of white grapes; the wine he made was excellent; it brought him an income of about a thousand zecchini and, bent on spending two thousand, he was ruining himself. Convinced that all the peasants robbed him, he prowled about everywhere, he entered their cottages, and wherever he found a few bunches of grapes he caned all those who, unable to deny that they had taken them from his vineyards, fell on their knees begging for pardon. After being present several times at these cruel scenes, it fell to my lot one day to witness the blows which two peasants rained on him with broomsticks; he saw fit to withdraw after receiving a sound thrashing. He chided me bitterly for having remained only a spectator of the affray. I proved to him by irrefutable arguments that I had no occasion to interfere in it, first because it was he who, as the aggressor, was in the wrong, and in the second place because I did not know how to fight with sticks, especially against peasants who, better skilled than I in that kind of duel, could have let me have one on the head which would have felled me like an ox. In his fury over a bruise on his face, he told me that I was a great coward and a booby who did not know the law that a man must defend his friend or die with him. To this dictum I replied only by a look whose meaning he must have understood.

The whole village heard of the affray; the peasants who had beaten him abandoned the estate; as soon as it became known that in future he would visit their cabins with pistols in his pockets the community assembled and sent him two speakers who told him that all the peasants would abandon the estate that week if he would not promise not to visit their cabins either alone or in company. In the eloquence of these proud boors I admired a philosophical argument which I thought sublime and which the Count thought ridiculous. They told him that the peasants had a right to eat a bunch of grapes from the vine which would have produced none if they had not cultivated it, just as his cook had the right to taste the stew which he had made in his kitchen for his master before he sent it to his table.

The threat of abandoning the estate, just at the time of harvest, terrified the brutal Count. They left, proud to have made him listen to reason.

One Sunday we went to the chapel to hear mass, and we found the priest at the altar, his Credo already said. I saw the Count's eyes flashing with anger. After the mass he went into the sacristy and gave the poor priest, who was still in his surplice, three or four blows with his cane; the priest spat in his face, and four or five people came running at his cries. We left. I told him that the priest would go to Udine[18] at once and would get him into very serious trouble; I soon persuaded him to prevent him from going there, even if he had to use force.

He called his servants, and he ordered them to bring the priest to his room, willingly or by force. The priest, foaming with rage and calling him a contumacious excommunicate, told him the most cutting truths; he ended by saying that neither he nor any other priest would celebrate mass in his chapel again, and that the Archbishop would avenge the crime he had committed. The Count let him talk on, and, preventing him from leaving the room, made him sit down at table, where he was weak enough not only to eat but to let himself get drunk. This disgusting behavior brought peace. The priest forgot everything.

A few days later two Capuchins came to call on him at noon. Seeing that they were not leaving, and not wanting to tell them to go, he had dinner served without ordering two more places set. The bolder of the two, when he saw that there was no intention of giving them food, said that they had not dined. At that the Count sent him a plate of rice; the Capuchin refused it, saying that he was worthy to dine not only with him but with a monarch. The Count, who could hardly keep from laughing, told him that their quidditative[19] epithet being "unworthy," they were worthy of nothing, and that furthermore the humility which they professed forbade them any pretensions. The Capuchin defending himself badly, and the Count being right, I thought I should support him. I told the Capuchin that he ought to be ashamed of breaking the rule of his Order by committing the sin of pride. He replied by insults, and the Count thereupon called for scissors to be brought, so that he could cut off the beards of the two impostors. At this dreadful threat they took to their heels, and we laughed heartily.

It was a joke, and I could easily have forgiven the Count if his vagaries had all been of this sort; but far from it. His intestines produced a chyle which infuriated him, and during the hours of digestion the fury which overcame him made him ferocious, cruel, unjust, bloodthirsty. His appetites became rages, he ate, and because it was from anger, it seemed an act of hatred when he devoured a succulent woodcock, of which I was voluptuously praising the exquisite delicacy. He one day gravely told me in so many words to eat and hold my tongue, for the praise I bestowed on the dishes which were served irritated him. I stopped praising for, after all, I had to submit to his decrees or else leave.

La Costa, with whom he had been in love, told me three months later in Trieste that she had not believed a man of such a character could exist before she knew Torriano. She told me that in amorous intercourse, though he was full of vigor, he was always angry because he could not achieve the pleasure which leads to the crisis which marks its end, and that he threatened to strangle her if she could not keep herself from showing physical signs of the voluptuousness which flooded her soul during the act. She pitied the lot of the woman who was destined to be his wife. But now for what finally exhausted my patience and forced me to part company with the poisonous creature.

In the boredom and idleness of Spessa, where I had not a single pleasure, I found myself attracted by a poor and very young widow, I gave her money, some tokens of the tender feelings she inspired in me, and, after obtaining her consent to minor pleasures, I persuaded her to grant me the principal ones in my room. She came at midnight, unseen by anyone, and she left at daybreak by a small door which opened onto the street. It was my only relief; she was in love, and amenable as a lamb, a very rare thing among the peasant women of Friuli, and I had had her seven or eight times. We were both perfectly unapprehensive in regard to our relationship, for we supposed that it must be unknown to everyone; we had no fear of masters or of jealousy or envy; but we were mistaken.

One fine morning Sgualda (such was her name) left my arms, and, after getting dressed, woke me as usual to go to lock the door by which she went out to return home.

I go; she leaves; but no sooner have I closed the door than I hear her screaming. I open the door, and I see the atrocious Count Torriano holding her by the dress with his left hand and caning her with his right. To see it and to spring on him was the work of an instant. We both fall, he underneath, I on top of him, and Sgualda runs off. In my nightshirt as I was, with one hand I was holding his arm with the stick, while I tried to strangle him with the other. For his part, he held me by the hair with his free hand and struggled to free himself. He did not let go until he felt that I was strangling him, and, instantly seizing his cane and rising, I rained blows at his head which he was lucky to ward off with his hands, taking to his heels and snatching up stones, which I did not wait to have strike me. I go back into the house and I lock myself in my room, not knowing whether we had been seen or not, and I throw myself on the bed out of breath and sorry that my hand had not been strong enough to strangle the barbarian who I thought was determined to murder me.

I take my pistols and I load them on the table, after refilling the pans; then I dress, and after shutting everything up in my trunk I put my pistols in my pocket and I go out, intending to find some peasant with a carriage to take me back to Görz. Without knowing it, I take a road which leads me past poor Sgualda's house; I enter, and I see her sad but calm; she comforted me by saying that she had been hit only on the shoulders by blows which had not hurt her very much; but she said that the thing would become public knowledge, for two peasants had seen the Count beating her, and had seen me, as she herself had seen me from a distance, struggling with him. I gave her two zecchini, I asked her to come to see me in Görz, where I intended to stay for two or three weeks, and to tell me where I could find a peasant who had a carriage, for I wanted to leave immediately. Her sister offered to take me to a farm where I would find a carriage and horses, and on the way she told me that Count Torriano had a grudge against Sgualda because as long ago as when her husband was alive she would never have anything to do with him.

At the farm I found what I wanted. The carriage was a good cart, and the peasant promised to have me in Görz by dinnertime. I gave him half a scudo on account, and I left, saying that I would wait for him. I go to the Count's house, I enter my room, and I put everything which I had left out in a portmanteau. The cart arrives.

One of the Count's servants comes to tell me that he requested me to go up to his room, where he wanted to talk with me. I instantly write him in clear French that after what had taken place between us I could not speak to him again except outside his house. A minute later he comes in, saying that if I would not speak with him in his room he has come to speak with me in mine, and he shuts the door.

He begins by telling me that my leaving his house in such a way would dishonor him, and that he would not let me go.

"I am curious to see how you will set about stopping me, for you will never persuade me to remain here of my own free will."

"I will prevent you from leaving alone, for honor demands that we leave together."

"I understand you. So go for your sword, or a pair of pistols, and we will leave at once, armed alike. In my carriage there is room for two."

"It is you who must leave in mine with me, after we have dined together."

"You are very much mistaken. Everyone would think me a fool to dine with you now, when our ugly meeting is known to the whole village and will be the talk of all Görz tomorrow."

"Then I will dine alone with you here, and people may say what they please. We will leave after dinner. Dismiss your carriage, and so prevent a scandal, for, I tell you again, you shall not leave."

I had to yield. I dismissed the carriage, and the wretched Count remained with me, beating about the bush until noon, trying to convince me that the wrong was all on my side, for I had no right to stop him from beating a peasant woman in the street to whom, after all, I had no possible title. I asked him, laughing at the savagery of his argument, what right he thought he had to beat a free woman in the street, and how he could suppose that the free woman would not find a defender in some man whose heart she had engaged, as had been the case, and how he could have imagined that I would stand patiently by while he killed a girl who had just left my arms, and for that reason alone. I asked him if I should not have been a vile coward, or a monster like himself, if I had remained indifferent to the scene. I ended by asking him if in my place he would not have done as I did without stopping to consult reason, even if he had had to deal with a great prince.

A little before we sat down at table he said that a duel over the matter would do no honor to the one of us who killed the other, for he was determined not to fight except to the death. I replied with a laugh that, so far as I was concerned, I did not agree, and if he thought that the matter stood so on his side he was perfectly free not to engage in the duel, for I considered myself satisfied already. As for fighting to the death, I said that I hoped to leave him among the living despite his rage, driving him to the wall, and that on his side he might do as he saw fit. He said that we would go to a wood, and that he would order his coachman to take me wherever I pleased if I came back to the carriage alone, and that he would bring no servant with him. After praising his noble attitude, I asked him if he wanted to fight with swords or pistols, and he said that swords would suffice. I then promised him that I would get rid of the pistols I had in my pocket when we were ready to leave.

It seemed to me impossible to see this savage creature become polite and reasonable, when the idea of an imminent duel ought to have troubled him to the soul, for I was certain that a man of his character could not be brave. Finding myself perfectly cool, I felt sure that I would lay him low instantly by my infallible right lunge, and then cripple him by pinking him in the knee if he wanted to go on. I thought I could take refuge in the Venetian State, from which, not being known, I could easily make my escape; but I thought I foresaw that nothing would come of it, and that the duel would dissolve into thin air like so many others when one of the heroes is a coward. I set the Count down as such.

After dining well, we left. He without anything, and I with all my small stock of possessions securely tied to the back of the carriage. In his presence I had emptied my pistols, and he had shown me that he had none. I had heard him order his coachman to take the road to Görz; but I kept expecting an order to turn left or right, for we were to fight in a wood. On the way I was careful not to ask him the slightest question. I understood what was afoot when I saw Görz, and I laughed heartily when we arrived there. The Count ordered the coachman to drive to the post house inn, and as soon as we got there he told me that I had been right, that we must remain good friends, and that we must promise each other not to mention the matter to anyone, only to laugh at those who should mention it to us, and not to take the trouble of relating it correctly to those who, when they told the story, changed its details. I gave him my promise, we embraced, and his carriage went to fetch him after the innkeeper Bailon[20] had had my luggage taken down from it.

The next day I went to lodge in a very quiet street to finish the second volume of my Troubles in Poland, but the time I spent on it did not prevent me from enjoying life until the time when I resolved to return to Trieste and there await the pardon of the new State Inquisitors. Remaining in Görz, I could give them no proof of my zeal, and it was my duty to pursue their interests, for they paid me for nothing else. I stayed in Görz until the end of the year 1773. During the six weeks I spent there I enjoyed all the comforts and pleasures I could wish for.

My adventure at Spessa being known to the whole town, everyone talked to me about it during the first days; but seeing that I only laughed at it as a thing of no consequence finally put an end to the questioning, and Luigi Torriano made much of his friendship for me wherever we met. However, I politely declined each time he invited me to dinner; he was a dangerous man, to be avoided at all costs. During the Carnival he married the young lady[21] I mentioned above; he made her unhappy for thirteen or fourteen years, until he died insane[22] and in poverty. What delighted me during those six weeks was Count Franz Karl Coronini,[23] of whom I believe I have spoken. He died three or four years later of an abscess in the head. A month before he died he sent me his will in Italian verses of eight syllables, which I still preserve as a specimen of his philosophical mind and the gaiety of his soul. Everything in it is comic and enlivened by the most subtle wit. If he had known that he was to die four weeks later he could not have written it, for the thought of death can inspire gaiety only in a madman.

A Monsieur Richard,[24] of Lorraine, came to settle in Görz at that time. He was a bachelor forty years of age who, after serving the Court of Vienna well in financial matters, had received permission to retire with a very good pension. He was handsome, he had the manner of the best society, some literary accomplishment, though without the least pretension, and he was received and made much of in all the houses in Görz. I met him in the house of Count Torres, which he frequented more than any of the others because of the intelligence of the young Countess, whom he married some time afterward.

At the beginning of October, as was customary, the new Council of Ten[25] had assumed its functions in my illustrious country; hence the new State Inquisitors had replaced the three who had reigned during the preceding twelve months. My protectors—that is, the Procurator Morosini, Senator Zaguri, and my loving friend Dandolo—wrote me that if they did not succeed in obtaining my pardon during the twelve months during which they were to sit they must give up hope of ever attaining it in their lives, for, aside from the virtues of the new Inquisitors, as chance would have it they honored them with their esteem and friendship. The State Inquisitor Sagredo[26] was a friend of the Procurator Morosini, the second Inquisitor, Grimani,[27] loved my faithful friend Dandolo, and Signor Zaguri assured me that he would personally persuade the third,[28] who by law had to be one of the six Councilors who are members of the Council of Ten. Though called "of Ten," that powerful Council was made up of seventeen personages, for the Doge was at liberty to sit with it whenever he pleased. So I went back to Trieste, thoroughly resolved to make every effort to serve the Tribunal well and thus deserve to obtain from its justice the pardon for which I longed after nineteen years which I had spent traveling all over Europe. At the age of forty-nine years which I had then reached, it seemed to me that I had nothing more to hope from Fortune, who loves only youth and is the declared enemy of ripe years. It seemed to me that in Venice I could not but live happily, without needing the blind Goddess's favors. I counted on being self-sufficient, profiting by my talents, feeling sure that I should succumb to no more misfortunes, armed as I was with immense experience, and cured, furthermore, of all the vanities which had led me to the verge of ruin. I thought I could be certain too that the State Inquisitors would find me some post in Venice itself, the emoluments from which would amply suffice for me to live in perfect comfort, being alone, with no family, and prepared to content myself with having what I decently needed, gladly resigning all superfluity. I was writing my History of the Troubles in Poland; the first volume was already printed; I was at work on the second, and I had enough material to present the whole history to the public divided into seven volumes.[29] After finishing this task I was thinking of publishing a translation of Homer's Iliad[30] in rhymed stanzas, and I had no doubt that after finishing these I should not find it difficult to produce other works. In short I did not fear that I could risk starving to death in a city where a hundred resources kept alive people who could live nowhere else except by begging. So I left Görz on the last day of the year 1773, and I put up at the principal inn on the Piazza in Trieste on the first day of 1774.

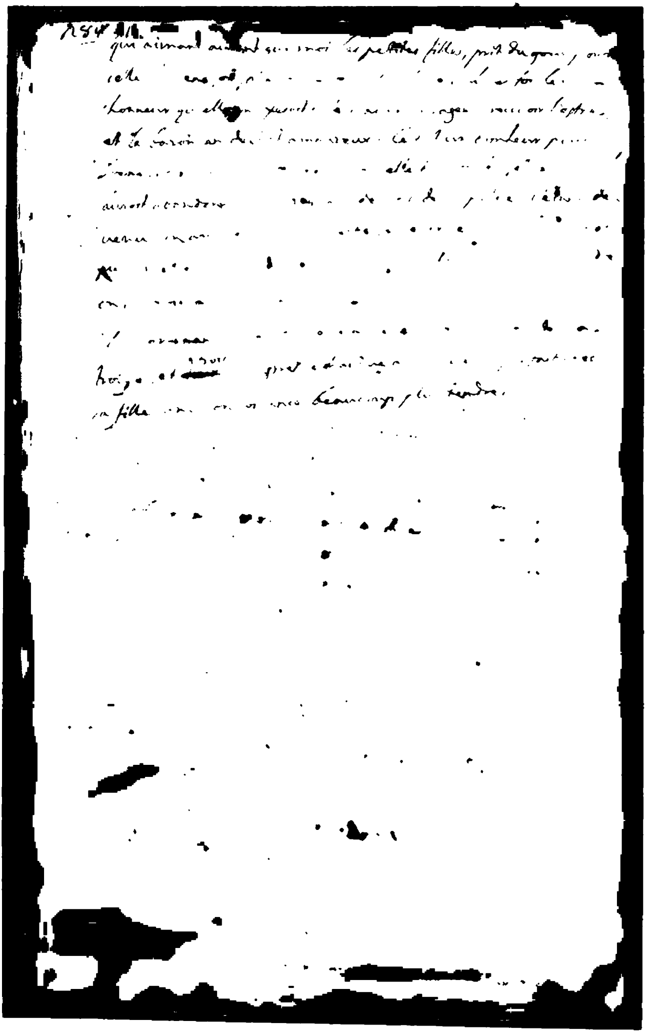
I could not have hoped to be better received. Baron Pittoni, the Venetian Consul, all the Councilors, the men of business, the ladies, and all the members of the Casino of the city saw me again with the greatest show of their pleasure in seeing me again. I spent the Carnival there in the utmost gaiety, enjoying perfect health, without interrupting my History of the Troubles in Poland, the second volume of which I published at the beginning of the Carnival.

The first thing which interested me in Trieste was the second actress of the troupe of comedians which was playing there.[31] I was surprised to see in her the Irene, daughter of the self-styled Count Rinaldi,[32] whom my reader doubtless remembers. I had loved her in Milan, I had neglected her in Genoa on account of her father, and I had been of use to her in Avignon, where I had come to her rescue with Marcolina's approval.[33] Eleven years had gone by during which I had never learned what had become of her. I was surprised to see her, and at the same time sorry, for, seeing her still pretty, I saw that she

The Doge's Palace, Venice



The Last Manuscript Page of Casanova's Memoirs might please me again, whereas, not being in a position to be of use to her, I ought to be on my guard. Thinking that I could not avoid paying her a visit, and in any case very curious to learn her story, I appeared before her the the next day an hour before noon.

She received me with a cry, saying that she had seen me in the parterre and that she was sure I would come to see her. She at once introduced her husband, who always played the role of Scapino,[34] and her daughter, who was nine years of age and showed talent for dancing. Her story was not long. The same year that I had seen her in Avignon she had gone to Turin with her father and, having fallen in love with the man she had introduced to me, she had left her parents to become his wife, and she had turned actress to join him on the stage. She knew that her father was dead, and she did not know what had become of her mother. She told me that she remained faithful to her duty as a wife, but without being so absurdly strict as to let her coldness discourage a man who declared that he loved her and who was worth listening to. At Trieste, however, she assured me that she had no one, and that her only pleasure was to give a little supper for some friends, which was not a drain on her resources, for she made more than enough by holding a small bank at faro. It was she who dealt, and she asked me to join in the game from time to time. On leaving, I assured her that she would see me that same day after the play and that, since the bank was small, gaming being forbidden in Trieste,[35] I would play like the others, for small stakes.

I went there, I supped with a company of coxcombs, young merchants, all in love with her. After supper she made a small bank, and we all began punting. But my surprise was not small when I saw, beyond the possibility of doubt, that she was cheating very skillfully, and always at just the right juncture. I felt like laughing when I saw her exercising her talent against me. It was a trifle, but I did not want Irene to suppose me a dupe. I saw her the next day at a rehearsal at the theater, and I congratulated her on her skill; at first she pretended not to understand me, and when I told her what I meant she had the impudence to say that I was mistaken; but when, turning my back on her, I said that she would repent of not having admitted it, she laughed and said it was true and that if I would tell her how much I had lost she was ready to give me back my money and even to let me have a share in her bank without anyone's knowing it except her husband. I said that I wanted neither, and even that I would no longer make one at her game, but to be very careful not to clean out any of her friends, for it would become known, and then she would be fined, for gaming was strictly forbidden. She said that she knew it, that she never carried anyone on his word, and that all the young men had promised her they would keep the secret. I told her that I would no longer go to sup with her, but that I should be pleased if she would come to breakfast with me when she had time. She came a few days later, with her daughter, who pleased me and who did not refuse me some caresses. One fine morning she made the acquaintance of Baron Pittoni, who, being as fond of young girls as I was, took a liking to Irene's daughter and asked her mother to do him the same honor sometimes that she granted me. I encouraged her to accept his offer, and the Baron fell in love with her. It was fortunate for Irene, because toward the end of the Carnival she was accused, and the Baron would have abandoned her to the rigor of the law and the police if, having become her friend, he had not warned her to stop gaming. She could not be fined, for when the police went to surprise her no one was to be found there.

At the beginning of Lent she left with the whole troupe, and three years later I saw her in Padua, where I resumed my acquaintance with her daughter on far more tender terms.[86]

Giovanni Battista Manuzzi's Report to the Inquisitors Concerning Casanova's Activities, July 17, 1755.*

Most Illustrious and Most Excellent Lords:

Having succeeded in learning from D[on] Gio[vanni] Batt[ist]a Zini, of the parish of San Samuel[e], concerning Giacomo Casanova that, in addition to the many friendships which he has with Noble Patricians, he believes that he has an understanding with some of them and brings them foreigners to gamble, to win their money, knowing from Casanova's own mouth that he has the art of cheating at cards, that Casanova makes [people] believe that they will not die but that they will be gently carried away by Fra Bernardo, who comes to raise them up and take them by the Milky Way to the Land of the Adepts, where Leggismarco lives; and with these damnable impostures of Rosicrucians and Angels of Light he bewitches people, as he did N. H. [the Nobleman] Ser Zuanne [Giovanni] Bragadin and other Noble Patricians to get money out of them. That the said Casanova professes the maxims of Picurec [Epicurus]. That with his impostures and chatter he entices people into a complete libertinism in all kinds of pleasure. That he is again cultivating N. H. Bragadin hoping to inherit from him and eat up all the rest; that many Noble Patricians, admiring his talents, lend him their support. That he is amazed [or: it is amazing] that nothing evil has happened to him in his so intimate association with Noble Patricians into whom he inculcates [?] certain maxims; that there is open war if one of them speaks ill of him.

Having all these things in mind, I brought Casanova to talk with me on similar subjects; he confided to me that he has managed to ingratiate himself with Duke Grillo who frequents the Al Buso drinkshop; that he made him several discourses on numbers with the idea of gradually bringing him to Chemistry [Alchemy] and deceiving him into believing that he knows how to compound the universal powder, and then persuade him that he will not die but pass gently over to the adepts; that from the answers he received from Grillo on the subject of the powder he saw that it would be a difficult undertaking since he had refuted his principles but that even so he could make him spend a treasure, which would almost all go into his own purse, without Grillo's being aware of it; that he had succeeded in bewitching others, especially Ser Zuanne Bragadin; that in view of the intimate friendship between them about seven years ago it had been bruited throughout the Country that both N. H. Bragadin and he talked with the spirits, that Bragadin having been warned that Masonry had been laid before This Most High Tribunal, in order not to be imprisoned or exiled he had left Venice. The said Casanova boasts that he is a cheater at cards, a freethinker, and believes in nothing in matters of Religion, that he has all the suppleness necessary to ingratiate himself with people and deceive them, that in the past he was often on the verge of ruin from lack of consideration, but that now he operates with the greatest caution, because this is a Country in which it is impossible to talk of Government or Religion without great danger, protesting that he believes nothing of our Religion, just as certain Noble Patricians of his acquaintance do not believe. That his frequentations are with Ser Zuanne Bragadin, Ser M[ar]co Ant[oni]o Zorzi, Ser Alvise Grimani, Ser Marco Donado, Ser Bernardo Mem[m]o, Ser Pro[curatore] Alvise Barbaro and very many other Noble Patricians who love him; that in the case of some of them he goes to their houses to dinner, since they all ask him, with others he goes to coffeehouses, to the wineshop called "da Lissandro" in Frezzaria, where he tells me that sometimes, but not often, they gamble. That he has many acquaintances among foreigners and among the noblest youths, that he frequents the houses of very many unmarried and married ladies and of women of another sort, that he tries to amuse himself in every way, and is always attempting great coups to improve his fortune; that he does not lack money to satisfy his desires, that some days ago he lost more than sixty zecchini in Padua. This loss I learned from Giacomo Canal, and I also heard of it from a certain Cesarino, a faro player who frequents the Mondo d'Oro; in the presence of the said Cesarino on Monday night in the drinkshop Al Rinaldo Trionfante Casanova read aloud an impious piece in verse, in the Venetian language, which he is now composing. I do not know if anything can be more monstrous than his thoughts and his talk on the subject of Religion, since Casanova holds that those who believe in Jesus Christ are feeble-minded. Conversing with and becoming intimate with the said Casanova one sees truly united in him misbelief, imposture, lasciviousness, voluptuousness in a manner to inspire horror. N. H. Ser Benedetto Pisano has knowledge of the imposture practiced on N. H. Ser Zuanne Bragadin by Casanova and that he made him believe that the Angel of Light would come to him, which made Casanova the ruin of the said N. H. Bragadin.

Giacomo Canal, who also knows N. H. Ser Bernardo Mem[m]o, tells me that Casanova is highly intelligent, that he is on intimate terms with Noble Patricians, that he believes that on occasion he serves them as a pimp, that Ser Bernardo Mem[m]o, though he is often with Casanova, sometimes loves him and sometimes despises him.

From Giacomo Berti I learn that one of the boys at the wineshop in Frezzaria told him that Casanova frequents it in the evening and that he retired to an inner room to talk with Ser Bernardo Mem[m]o and with Barbaro, and that some of them have seen Casanova in the past few days with a purse full of gold and that he always has money.

Bernard de Muralt's Letter to Albrecht von Haller*

Most honored sir and my very dear friend,

We have had staying here at the Crown for a couple of months a foreigner named Chevalier de Seingalt who was well recommended to me by the Marquis de Gentil on the strength of recommendations in his favor which he received from a lady of consequence in Paris. He left here day before yesterday for Lausanne, where he will stay for some time, and whence he proposes to visit you, being curious (1) to see you and (2) [to see] the saltworks. He asked me for a letter of recommendation to you, dear sir and friend, which I was prevented from writing before he left and which, in any case, I preferred to send you by post. This foreigner is worth your seeing and you will find him a really curious and interesting specimen. He is an enigma which we have not been able to decipher here, nor could we make out what manner of man he is. He does not know as much as you do, but he knows a great deal. He talks on all subjects with great spirit, and appears to have seen and read a prodigious amount. He is said to know all the oriental languages, of which I am not competent to judge. He had no direct letter of recommendation to anyone here. It appears that he did not wish to be known. He received a great many letters by post every day, wrote all morning, and told me that his correspondence was entirely concerned with matters of general interest, a system of accounting and a well-known formula for saltpeter.

* The first page of the original letter is reproduced facing page 195.

He speaks French like an Italian, having been brought up in Italy. He told me the story of his life, too long for me to repeat it to you. He will tell it to you whenever you wish. He told me that he is a free man, a citizen of the world, that he obeyed the laws of all the sovereigns under whom he lived. He led an extremely well-regulated life here. His predominant interest, from what he told me, is natural history and chemistry. My cousin De Muralt, the adept, who was greatly attached to him and who has also given him a letter to you, supposes that he is the Count of Saint-Germain. He gave me proofs of his knowledge of the cabala which are astonishing if they are genuine and which would make him almost a sorcerer, but here I cite you my author; in short, he is a most singular personage. His clothes and appointments are of the best. After you, he intends to go and politely point out to Monsieur de Voltaire a large number of errors in his books. I do not know if so charitable a man will be to Voltaire's taste. When you have seen him do me the favor of telling me what you think of him. But, what will interest me more, please give me news of your doings and your health. . . .

B. de Muralt

"After a silence of a year and a half, I received from you yesterday a good letter which has consoled me in informing me that you are in perfect health. But, on the other hand, I was much pained to see that in your letter you did not call me Friend, but Madame. . . You have reason to chide me and to reproach me for having rented a house without surety or means of paying the rent. As to the advice you give me that if some honest person would pay me my rent, or at least a part of it, I should have no scruples about taking it because a little more, or a little less, would be of little importance. . . I declare to you that I have been desolated at receiving from you such a reproach which is absolutely unjustified. . . You tell me that you have near you a young girl who merits all your solicitations and your love, she and her family of six persons who adore you and give you every attention; that she costs you all you have, so that you cannot send me even a sou. . . I am pained to hear you say that you will never return to Venice, and yet I hope to see you again. . ."

The "young girl" referred to in Francesca's letter was Anna-Dorothea Kleer, daughter of the porter of the chateau. This young girl became pregnant in 1786 and Casanova was accused of seducing her. The guilty one, however, was a painter named Schottner who married the unfortunate girl in January 1787.

9th August 1786.

"My only true friend,

"It is two days since I received your dear letter; I was very happy to see your writing. . . You have reason to mortify me and reproach me in recalling all the troubles I caused you, and especially that which you call treachery, the sale of your books, of which in part I was not guilty. . . Forgive me, my dear friend, me and my foolish mother who, despite all my objections, absolutely insisted on selling them. Regarding that which you write me that you know that my mother, last year, told about that you had been my ruin, this may unhappily be true, since you already know the evil thoughts of my mother, who even says that you are still at Venice. . . When have I not been always sincere with you, and when have I not at least listened to your good advices and offers? I am in a desperate situation, abandoned by all, almost in the streets, almost about to be homeless. . . Where are all the pleasures which formerly you procured me? Where are the theaters, the comedies which we once saw together! . . ."

5th January 1787.

"The first of the year I received your dear letter with the bill of exchange for one hundred and twenty-five lires which you sent me so generously. . . You say you have forgiven me for all the troubles I have caused you. Forget all, then, and do not accuse me any more of things which are but too true and of which the remembrance alone cuts me to the heart . . . You write me that you have been forgotten by a person of whom you were very fond, that she is married and that you have not seen her for more than a month."

The "person" referred to was Anna Kleer.

5th October 1787.

"Until the other day, I had been waiting for your arrival, hoping that you would come to assist at the entry of the Procurator Memmo . . . I see by your good letter that you were not able to get away, since your presence is nearly always necessary in the great chateau . . . I learn of the visit you have received from the Emperor who wished to see your library of forty-thousand volumes! . . . You say that you detest the chase and that you are unhappy when politeness obliges you to go . . . I am pleased to know that you are in good health, that you are stout and that you have a good appetite and sleep well . . . I hope that the printing of your book (Histoire de ma fuite) is going according to your wishes. If you go to Dresden for the marriage of your niece, enjoy yourself for me . . . Forget not to write to me; this gives me such pleasure! Remember me. Full of confidence in your friendship, I am, and always will be, your true and sincere friend,

Francesca Buschini."

LETTERS WRITTEN TO MASTER FAULKIRCHER BY HIS BEST FRIEND JACQUES CASANOVA DE SEINGALT, 10th January 1792.[1]

Est hoc pro certo, quoties cum stercore certo vinco seu vincor, semper ego maculor.

FIRST LETTER.

IN the ordinary course of events there could be nothing in common between you and me, Mr. Faulkircher, excepting our joint presence in this Château of Dux, where I am employed as librarian and you as house steward, but in these days it is not the ordinary that happens, but the extraordinary. You stand accused of three crimes committed against my honour, and I want you to be tried according to judicial form. I must inform the public of the nature and circumstances of these crimes, and the public is an impartial judge whom you cannot bribe; there is not enough wine in all the cellars of Count Waldstein for that. The public shall decide whether you are or not a worthless man and a coward, and whether you know or not what honour and the laws of honour mean.

Pluck up courage, Faulkircher, and answer these letters, but be honest enough to send the replies in French, Latin, Italian, or if needs be Spanish. I have been at the pains to address you in German. I have had to pay a translator, you must do the same; let us not be ashamed to publish our ignorance, you, of all the languages of Europe, and I, of German. Another charge I bring against you, is of having exposed me in effigy, in the most vulgar and insulting manner, and for this I appeal to the laws of decency to punish, I do not exactly know how.

[1] There is no evidence to show that these letters were ever sent to Faulkircher, and there is no hint in Casanova's papers of his having received a reply. They were written, probably, to relieve the bitterness and acrimony of the author's heart, and show, more than anything else, how age, and the humiliation of his subordinate position, had weakened his mind.

In the meantime I remain yours to command, with all the ceremonious phrases one puts at the end of letters, and which mean nothing at all.

SECOND LETTER.

Although we have never been able to reason together, because you can only jabber in bad German, we might nevertheless have been on very good terms, if you had any education, either from books or good company, in which latter a man may at least learn morality and the laws of honour. You were obliged to become a soldier, at the age when I was learning to read, and you cannot be expected to have learned refinement of expression or sentiment in the guard-room, or barracks. You have not gained polish by the frequentation of educated people, or been able to enlarge your mind by reading instructive books, as I, poor and humble by birth as I am, have done. For this I should pity you, as sincerely as I congratulate myself. For the rest you have followed your military career so faithfully, and have known so well how to employ your talents, that in less than fifty years you have reached the high rank of sub-lieutenant! Having attained this noble grade, you had the courage to check your ambition, to repose on your laurels, and to simply ask for your discharge and a pension, both of which you obtained. You asked for your discharge on the score of infirmity, but laziness is the proper name for your disease. Fortunately for you this was not known, or you would have been deprived of your pension of the hundred florins, and the right to wear a uniform; this latter right puts you on a footing with other gallant sons of Mars, who do not live in the private domestic service of a grand superior. It is true that you are very generous with your master's wine, and distribute it freely, not only to the officers quartered at Dux, but to all who come, either on business or pleasure. You may be sure these officers know you have no business to be so lavish, but they consider that it is not for them to teach you honesty. If your proceedings reached the ears of Jupiter, or his councillors, you would be sent packing, without your uniform, and without your pension. Count Waldstein would, I am sure, give you a pension of four hundred ducats as compensation, but you would no longer be called lieutenant, and this little matter gratifies your vanity.

THIRD LETTER.

When you first came to Dux, Master Faulkircher, and saw me and learned what my position and employment were, you began to rack your brains in vain to understand what need Count Waldstein had of a librarian, at a salary of a thousand florins a year.

In your zeal for his interests you advised him to get rid of me, and as you could not persuade him to do this, you formed the project of plaguing me to such an extent, and of making things so disagreeable to me that I should of my own accord throw up my situation. During the first two years it was not easy for you to succeed—the Count was not at Dux, I took my meals alone in my room, and paid for them myself, so I had nothing to do with you; but since then I have had the misfortune to be cheated by the bookseller Hilscher, at Leipsic, through whom I lost four thousand florins, to make up which I have to lay aside half my salary, and this has obliged me to accept the Count's offer to eat in the servants' hall, when he is absent. It is an advantage, but a fatal one, for it obliges me to sit opposite a creature like you. This circumstance has put it in your power to inflict on me all the petty miseries your fine mind delights in, either directly or indirectly, for, ass that you are, you like to put on a lion's skin. Unfortunately for you the ears always stick out, the mask falls, and you are shown in your natural ugliness. Though I always knew just what you were, false, ignorant and pretentious, I made an effort to treat you with an appearance of consideration, and you imagined that I had some esteem for you. Pray undeceive yourself. If we had been in a country where duels were permitted, and I had provoked you to fight, either with sword or pistol, I am sure fear would have rendered you paralytic, and you would probably have got your friend Viderol to assassinate me. The things which you have done, since the month of September 1790, confirm me in my knowledge and judgment of your character.

FOURTH LETTER.

The Count had hardly left Dux when you managed to put the inspector at my heels, and he, at your instigation, insulted me deeply. I will write the story down.

One day the worthy inspector, Stelzl, told me, no doubt with the best intentions in the world, that if I had not published my Icosameron, I should not now be in want of money, and that if in future I wished to live at my ease I ought never to touch a pen again, the more so as I had enough to live on without writing. I repeated this to Count Waldstein, and made fun of the counsel, but not of the counsellors, for Stelzl does not understand that the only thing which makes life bearable to me is the liberty to write, and publish my writings. I know that literary work may appear hard labour to Monsieur Stelzl, who, though very clever in his trade, only exercises it as a means of livelihood, and not to express his own ideas; writing must be to him what chopping wood is to a woodcutter. He was right in his way, and I was right in mine, when I made fun of his point of view to the Count, who, laughing himself, repeated what I had said to you, and you in turn had nothing better to do than to hurry off and tell the inspector, whose vanity, of course, was hurt, and who reproached me for the way in which I spoke of his intelligence, declaring he would give me no more advice. I tried to justify myself as well as I could, but he would not listen to my excuses. He remained angry with me, and the following day when he met me did not return my salutation. The day after it was still worse, for when I went to his wife's reception she did not admit me into the circle, or offer me a seat. You were there, Faulkircher, by the side of your friend Viderol, and you laughed. I swallowed the affront as well as I could, and for four months I have not left my room, except to dine with you in the servants' hall. You hated to see me go to the inspector's house, for when I was there I spoke Latin with him, or French with his wife, and you could not put in any of your stupid observations, as you did not understand us.

On New Year's day 1791, I took upon myself to go and wish him the compliments of the season; the inspector offered me a chair, which I did not accept. An hour afterwards he returned my visit, and did not accept the seat I offered him. I showed you the same mark of politeness, but as you know nothing of the ways of polite society you did not come to see me. So much the worse for you!

Fifth Letter.

There is, at the Château at Dux, an oratory, where only the Count, his family, his principal officers, and the officers of the garrison are allowed to attend divine service. I go there to hear Mass, because the Count told me it was my right place, and you go for the same reason. Viderol took to attending the services there; I spoke to the Count about it, and he was forbidden to do so. In spite of this, he reappeared about ten months ago, in company with your Caroline, who, when she takes the trouble to think of such things, says she is a Lutheran. When I saw this pretty couple, I turned on my heel and went to make my devotions in the parish church, in the midst of my brethren, the honest Catholic peasants. Viderol continued to parade about near the altar with a missal in his hand, to make people think he could read. As a reward, you applauded him more loudly than ever, when he indulged in his usual sarcasm at my expense. I suppose you hoped that, teased beyond endurance, I should fling my plate at his head, and that he would fling his back at mine, while you preserved a dignified neutrality, sure that in the end he would batter me senseless. My patience knew how to resist, however, so you consulted with him as to a new insult, and one which it would be impossible for me to support. You, the house steward of the Count of Waldstein, you ordered him to do, what as a soldier I am sure you would have refused to do, had one of your officers commanded you—you ordered your vile satellite to put my portrait in an unmentionable place—and to write across it an epithet which you taught him. When I complained, you laughed, and said it was not a criminal affair; when I begged you at least to have my meals sent to my room, you refused, and by this I knew that you were the instigator of the plot.

SIXTH LETTER.

I resolved to punish your infamous flunky, so I consulted a lawyer, and wrote a complaint in German; but when you heard of this you came and begged me not to mention your name, as it might do you harm with the military authorities if they learned you were in the Count's service, as they supposed you only stayed with him as a friend. I tore up the first complaint, and wrote a second in Latin, and sent it to a magistrate at Dux. In it I simply asked to be guaranteed against further insult till the return of the Count. Monsieur Luser, the town magistrate of Dux, summoned Viderol before him, and made him swear, on pain of punishment, to cease his ill conduct to me. On leaving the magistrate, Viderol went straight to you, and you immediately intimated to the magistrate that the law had no jurisdiction in the Count's house, and during his absence. At the same time, you put Viderol up to stealing another of my portraits, out of one of my books, and exposing it for the second time, and in a still more infamous manner. I informed the magistrate of how his orders were obeyed. Viderol was summoned a second time, and denied everything. I should have addressed myself to a higher tribunal had not the Dowager Countess advised me to wait till her son returned. You know that I told the whole story to every one who came to the Château, and I even conducted several people to the door of the place, where for six weeks your chef-d'œuvre was exposed. Every one said that as you did not order this abomination to be removed, it was because it pleased you to see it there, and that consequently you deserved the same punishment as your delightful favourite.

SEVENTH LETTER.

Six weeks went by; Prince d'Anhalt-Koethen was coming to pass two days at the Château, and you knew that my first care would be to show the picture to this worthy personage, so you had it removed the very day of his arrival. This did not prevent me telling him the whole story, and explaining to his highness why I refused the dish your infamous menial offered me at table. The prince was indignant at your having allowed the scoundrel to wait upon him, and said that had he known his conduct, and yours, he would not have allowed him to stand behind his chair; he added that full justice would be done me when the Count returned. I was less surprised, however, when you made the wretched scoundrel wait on the Princesse de Clary and the Princess Jablonowska, when these illustrious ladies came some time after, for they knew your history, and you were too much ashamed to show yourself. You were warned of the arrival of the ladies, and I think that you, master of the magnificent Waldstein cellars, might have treated them better, and not served them such a miserable repast; you should surely have given them Tokay, and not the poor miserable wine of the country.

EIGHTH LETTER.

Your character is written on your face with such distinctness, that any one can read it at a glance. In the network of wrinkles which cover your old physiognomy can be seen spite, meanness, malice, and ambitious ignorance. You only care about the society of your inferiors, so as to be made much off. When by chance you find yourself among your superiors, you look like a spy, and behave like one. Your jokes, which make people laugh because you laugh at them first, are always satirical and calumnious, the fruit of your hateful mind. It is on this account that fools say you are witty, and that all the inmates of the Château are afraid of you, except the oldest of all, the porter, Frederick, who is surly and ill-mannered, but faithful; a miserly peasant, but an honest one; he does his duty, and despises you openly. I saw him in my own room throw a volume of Bayle's dictionary at your head; since then you have managed to make him die of grief. Your Caroline thought the old man had committed an unheard-of crime; naturally, for she cringes to you like a slave, and interlards her every sentence with Monsieur le lieutenant, therefore you are very good to her. You have given her an apartment where she can receive any friends she chooses, and they do say your unworthy behaviour has made the Château of Dux a scandal to the neighbourhood, and respectable people avoid it, for one is robbed and assassinated with impunity in the Château and the adjacent streets. You have brought shame on the noble dwelling of your master, and have changed a table which, though only a servants' table, was decent and supportable, into one of bad repute. It ought not to be so, for Caroline observes the decorum of an honest woman, and the cook and his wife are decent creatures, and you, if you behaved differently, could take the head of it with dignity. I should have been well enough satisfied if you had known how to maintain order, and should not have considered that Count Waldstein had conferred a doubtful benefit on me. As it is, I am like a noble horse whose misfortunes oblige him to herd with asses; he is forced to suffer their kicks and hustlings, as he feeds at the same rack with them. If I had been young, instead of old, I should have laid about me with a stick, for I own the old porter's courage made me blush for my own cowardice. The brave fellow never thought of his eighty years when he threw the book at your head, or of how you, being the stronger, might crush him. I am jealous of his bravery, but it is sword in hand that I should like to send you into another world, and you, old soldier as you are, dare not stand up at twelve paces from me!

Then I have to reproach you for saying that I was wrong in accusing Viderol of having written that if I succeeded in having him punished he would kill me. Who else could have written this anonymous letter but he? Do you suppose I invented it to make him appear worse? Monster that you are, do you think I need invent grievances against you when you both deserve the gallows?

NINTH LETTER.

Poor old Frederick is dead of grief and sorrow. He told me twenty times that since you accused him of stealing the wine by means of false keys, he had not had a moment's rest. O heartless, soulless man, you ought to pine away with remorse for having distressed the good old fellow! What if he did take a few bottles, do you suppose the Count would grudge them to him at his age? You hastened the end of an honest man, who after fifty years' faithful service deserved better treatment. After his death I put a padlock on the library door, and you dared to take it off, saying I had no right to put it there. Rest assured, if so much as one book is missing I shall accuse you of having abstracted it, during the few hours in which the padlock was removed, for in spite of your almighty power it was put back. Every one is scandalised at your behaviour, and if it came to the ears of the authorities, you would lose the two hundred florins pension which the Emperor allows you in your quality of disabled soldier, but——.

TENTH LETTER.

Well, Master Faulkircher, you did a master stroke when you ordered your favourite to attack me and beat me in the streets of Dux, at ten o'clock of a Sunday morning, the 11th of December 1791. Nothing indeed could be easier. I am old, I was unarmed, I had not even my cane, I could offer no resistance, and I had to take refuge in the magistrate's house; he, by the bye, was away from home.

After this noble deed, the executioner of it informed the magistrate that he only laid hands on me in obedience to your orders, and the magistrate, to whom I complained, assures me that in future the rogue will leave me in peace.

'And you will not imprison him?' I said.

'You see he is in the Count's service,' he answered.

And you think that you can behave thus, you vile and cowardly souls, under laws sanctioned by Leopold II.

It is you, Faulkircher, who have caused the ruin of the poor magistrate, who, more stupid even than you are, allowed himself to be influenced by you. I ought to denounce him, but I am sorry for his family.

You have conquered, Faulkircher, you have done everything in your power to oblige me to leave Dux,[1] and you have succeeded; but your triumph is a small one, and I shall obtain justice elsewhere. A magistrate such as Luser is only to be found at Dux. I shall find one who will resist your seductions, and prefers honours to all the riches of the earth.

ELEVENTH LETTER.

Young Luser, the magistrate at Dux, who you have been clever enough to bribe, writes to me all the impertinence which you dictate to him in bad Latin. He says you say you only know two facts about me: one is that in 1767 I was driven out of Paris (which is a lie); the other is an infamous anecdote which you read in a libel which was printed about me at Töplitz in 1790. But if you quote an infamous libel you become infamous yourself, according to the code of Justinian, which you probably never heard of, and which Luser probably never read.

As for my being expelled from Paris, I deny it formally, though I will own that I had the honour to receive from the King of France a letter signed by his own hand, a letter which I still possess, and which I show to my friends. In it his majesty orders me, for reasons known to himself, to leave his kingdom. The bearer of the letter was a chevalier of the Order of Saint Louis, who told me I could leave at my own convenience, only it must be understood that I was not to go to the Hôtel d'Elbœuf, where I had had the foolhardiness to challenge the Marquis de Lille, who was not then twenty years old. I obeyed, and after having diverted myself for a year and a half in Spain, I returned to Paris, where I supped with the same Marquis de Lille at Monsieur d'Aiguebelle's. In 1783 I spent another three months in Paris, and what is more, a week at Fontainebleau, where I went with my brother, and provided with a passport from Monsieur de Vergennes. If you do not believe me you have only to go to Vienna, and ask my brother, whom you will find every day at the Prince de Kaunitz's table. You will perhaps sit next to him, for of course you will not be sent to the servants' hall. Such ways are peculiar to Dux. I can assure you I consider that a lettre de cachet does me more honour than your brevet of sub-lieutenant from His Imperial, Royal, and Apostolic Majesty.

A major-general who knows you by reputation tells me, and I believe him, that you are an officer; it is true, but not in the same way that the others are!

TWELFTH LETTER.

As the good man Luser says you only know two things about me, I will tell you a few facts, by which you may know me in future.

But as I wish to avoid the accusation of fatuity, I will confine myself to negative indications, as theologians do when they wish to make some one understand what the devil is like.

1. I was not brought up in barracks.
2. I have never been beaten with a stick, till by your orders at Dux.
3. I have never held a military position by virtue of which I had to go from Peter to Paul at my superior's orders.
4. I have never been a drunkard.
5. I have never been seen in low company, or eating with such, until you obliged me to do so at Dux.
6. I never forged certificates to keep a pension which otherwise I should have lost.
7. I never allowed any one to be wanting in respect to a man with whom I was at table.
8. I have never refused to fight a duel with any one who demanded satisfaction from me.
9. I have never in my life forgiven a deliberate insult until I had the rogue who propounded it under my heel.
10. I have never calumniated any one.
11. I have never believed a defamatory libel.
12. I have never been wanting in the respect due to old age. I have never forgotten that due to a man who, without being born a gentleman, has made himself one by study and literature.
13. I have never been an habitual adulterer.
14. I have never made, or caused to be made, an effigy of any one.
15. I have never allowed any of my companions to kiss my hand before leaving the table.
16. I have never been driven to pass my time in low company in pot-houses for want of employment, my love of literature having always preserved me from this.
17. I have never broken open doors or locks, of which I was not the master, so as to cast suspicion on the probity of others.
18. I have never ordered a defenceless old man to be assassinated in the street.
19. I have never intercepted letters.
20. Finally, I have never exhausted myself by trying to find means of injuring and wounding my neighbours.

These twenty negative qualities may assist you in deducing some positive ones by which you will know me, but it may be impossible for you to do so, as to deduce one fact from another, one principle from another, implies a certain amount of reason, method, judgment, and study in all of which you are wanting. How can I make you understand me? Poor sub-lieutenant! You must ask Viderol; he is witty, he has a prodigious talent. This is what you said yourself one day, when you stupidly and spitefully allowed him to take off your master and his, the Count von Waldstein, at table. For shame! you should blush, Faulkircher, and hide yourself from every eye

AVENTUROS

PORTRAIT OF CASANOVA BY THE PRINCE DE LIGNE[1]

He would be a very fine man if he was not ugly. He is tall, built like a Hercules, but with an almost African complexion; his eyes are bright, truthful-looking, and intelligent, but they indicate an uneasy susceptibility and a revengeful ferocity; it would seem easier to make him angry than to make him laugh. He seldom laughs, though he makes others do so. He has a way of saying things which reminds one of Harlequin and Figaro.

He knows everything, excepting the things which he prides himself on knowing—such as dancing, the rules of the French language, good taste, and the ways of high society. In the same way, it is only his comedies which are not comic, his philosophical works in which there is no philosophy, all the others are full of it, and of depth, character, piquancy, and originality. He is a mine of science and learning, but wearies one with quotations from Homer and Horace.

His witty sallies have a flavour of Attic salt. He is sensitive and grateful; but when he is displeased, is grumbling, bitter, and altogether detestable. No sum which one could give him would atone for a little joke at his expense. His style is like that of old prefaces—long, diffuse, and heavy—but if he has anything to tell—his adventures, for instance—he tells them so amusingly and dramatically that one is quite carried away. He beats Gil Blas or the Diable Boiteux in interest. He believes in nothing except what [illegible] least worthy of credence, being superstitious on many points. Fortunately, he is high-minded and delicate, for when he says, 'I have sworn to God,' or 'God so wills it,' there is nothing can stop him. He wants everything, and covets everything, and after having possessed everything, he knows how to do without everything.

[1] See de Ligne's Mémoires et Mélanges historiques et littéraires, Paris, 1828, vol. iv. [illegible] 291.

His head is always running on women and little girls, and in his head they have to remain, which makes him furious. He rages against the fair sex, against himself, against Heaven, against Nature, but, above all, against the year 1725. He makes up for this failure of power, as well as he can, by eating, and drinking enormously. As he can no longer be a god in the gardens or a satyr in the forests, he will be a wolf at table: he lets nothing pass him, begins gaily and finishes sadly, grieving that he cannot begin all over again.

If he sometimes uses his superior intelligence to get the better of foolish men or women, it is, he says, to make those around him happy. In the midst of the disorders of a stormy youth, and a most adventurous and somewhat equivocal career, he could show a strong sense of delicacy, honour, and courage. He is proud because he is nothing. If he had been a landowner, a financier, or a great nobleman, he would have been more easy-going; as it is, no one must contradict him, and no one must laugh at him; every one must read his books and listen to his stories. You must never tell him that you have heard an anecdote before; listen to it as though for the first time. Do not forget to salute him respectfully, or you will make an enemy for life. His prodigious imagination, the vivacity which is his birthright, his travels, the many parts he has played, his courage in the absence of all moral and physical support, make up an extraordinary personality, good to know, and worthy of the consideration and friendship of the small number of people of whom he condescends to ask it.

EXTRACTS FROM THE 'MEMOIRS OF THE PRINCE DE LIGNE'

FRAGMENTS RELATING TO CASANOVA

CASANOVA was a man of high character, intelligence, and knowledge, who had seen the world. In his Memoirs he writes himself down an adventurer, the son of an unknown father, and a third-rate Venetian actress. I have drawn his portrait in my works, and called him Aventuros.

The merit of his Memoirs lies precisely in their cynicism, but it is this very cynicism which will prevent their ever being given to the world, though they are full of dramatic turns, of comedy, vivacity, philosophy, of original, sublime, and inimitable things.

I will try and set down here what I remember of the things he told me.

When he returned from his ridiculous expedition to Constantinople, he met his two brothers, likewise come back from travelling in foreign lands.

'What have you learned?' he asked them.

'Directly they opened their mouths,' he said to me afterwards, 'I saw that one would turn out a fool and the other a maniac: the fool, however, developed a genius for painting, and became the most celebrated painter of battlepieces of his time, and took the place of Lebrun, van der Meulen, and Bourguignon. His prophecy as regards the other, who died at Dresden, was more accurate.

One day he saw his mother on the boards, and made up his mind that she was a detestably bad actress. He went up to her dressing-room, embraced her (he had not seen her for years, and she did not know what had become of him), and there and then persuaded her to abandon the theatre.

'You will get along very well,' he told her, 'for one of the little women I loved when I was fifteen has married a procurator, and I share his wealth and his pleasures; the child has not forgotten her first sweetheart.'

Epigrams, ballads, sarcasms, indiscretions, criticisms of the direction of his beloved republic of Venice, Casanova treats us to them all—love, jealousy, imprudence, rope-ladders, bribed boatmen, adventures of every sort. He plays the great lord in a grey lustrine coat embroidered with flowers, with a large Spanish lace collar, and a hat with a feather, a yellow waistcoat, and crimson silk breeches, as he is represented on the frontispiece of his work on his escape from 'The Leads.'

This book is worth reading. The style is odd, and somewhat barbarous, but lively and interesting, and bearing the stamp of truth on every word. A great number of Venetians have assured me of the truth of the story.

Some time after his flight from prison the fancy seized him to add the name of Seingalt to his own; it would give him, he said, more the appearance of a gentleman, and he would be beholden to no sovereign in Europe for it.

After having wandered about the world for seventeen years, he determined to try his fortune in Russia. 'Who knows,' said he, 'I shall perhaps obtain some situation at the Court of the Great Catherine—librarian, secretary, diplomatic agent, tutor to some young nobleman, or lover to the Empress! There are two or three French hairdressers and an Italian pastry-cook filling such employment at Petersburg. I am worth as much, or more, than they.'

At the close of one of the long Northern days that have no night, Catherine was walking with some of her ladies in the summer gardens, when she saw an extraordinary-looking man examining the statuary with a mocking air. She guessed at once that it was the man whose name had been made known to her through the reports of her police.

'That statue does not please you, sir?'

'No, madame; it [illegible] out of proportion.'

'It is a nymph.'

'It does not look like one, madame! Where are the usual attributes?'

'Are you not the brother of the painter?'

'Yes, madame; how does your Majesty know that? and how comes she to be familiar with a wretched dauber like my brother?'

'He is a genius, sir, and I think a great deal of him.'

'He has a good eye for colour, madame, and a fair sense of composition, but drawing is not his strong point, and his pictures are unfinished.'

'Have you seen the little wooden house Peter the Great built—the first in Petersburg?'

'Yes, madame; he ought to have gone to Italy instead of to France for his architect.'

His criticisms on his brother were literally just. I have often reproached Francis with the cannon or pistol fired off in the middle of his pictures, so that the smoke might cover their imperfections.

By these means one could take his Turks' turbans to mean anything or nothing. All his horses had Roman noses; but this was from principle, as his model was made that way.

This Casanova, the painter I mean, was a most singular man. One day when I was speaking of his pictures in the Palais Bourbon, I said laughingly, 'Why did you represent my great-grandfather as running away at full speed on a big grey horse after the battle of Lens, when every one knows that he was made prisoner at the head of the infantry, after having done marvels in leading the cavalry?' He did not answer.

Thirty years after he painted a large picture which was sent to the Russian empress. It was the portrait of the Emperor Joseph, surrounded by his generals, Lacy, Laudon, Haddik, who all had a right to be there, but imagine my astonishment when I recognised myself among them! All my comrades were jealous. 'Why did you put me there?' I asked.

'To make amends for a wrong,' said Casanova, 'which I did to a Prince de Ligne in 1648.'

Marshal Pellegrini said, in a droll voice, 'My comrade, my countryman, for I come from Verona, put me in too, I implore you, if you only squeeze me into a little corner!'

'There is no more room, your excellency.'

'My friend, if I am hidden by the frame, if only the end of my nose shows, I should be happy. I beg you put me in.'

And he got in by sheer importunity.

I cannot remember all the places where Jacques Casanova went in his double character of knight-errant and wandering Jew, but after many years of this existence he began to find the gates of cities, courts, and castles closed to him. I remember, however, that he went to Vienna, where his brother was established, and profited by the complaisance of the Emperor Joseph, who received all sorts of people.[1]

'It seems to me,' said Joseph, who never forgot a detail, 'that you were the friend of Signor Zaguri.'

[1] From this point the Memoirs of de Ligne deal with a time posterior to the Memoirs of Casanova, which finish in 1774. The prince was writing what he remembered from reading Casanova's manuscripts, which [illegible] a further proof that the original Memoirs were carried much further than those we possess.

'Yes,' answered Casanova, 'he was a Venetian nobleman.'

'I don't think much of his nobility. I do not care for people who buy titles.'

'And how about those who sell them, sire?'

Joseph changed the conversation; it was easy to see he was displeased at this bold reply, which was, nevertheless, just. I think it was soon after this that Casanova went to Paris for the last time. My nephew, Waldstein, met him at the Venetian ambassador's, and took a great liking to him. Waldstein pretended to believe in magic, and to practise it: he began to talk about the clavicula of Solomon, and of Agrippa.

'How strange that you should speak to me of these things,' cried Casanova; 'O! che bella cosa, cospetto!—how familiar all these things are to me!'

'If that is so,' said Waldstein, 'come to Bohemia with me, I am leaving to-morrow.'

Casanova, who had come to an end of his money, his travels, and his adventures, took Waldstein at his word, and became his librarian. In this quality he passed the last fourteen years of his life at the Château of Dux, near Toeplitz, where for six succeeding summers he was a constant joy to me, because of his enthusiastic liking for me, and his useful and agreeable knowledge.

It must not be supposed, however, that he was content to live quietly in the haven of refuge that the kindness of Waldstein had provided for him. It was not in his nature. Not a day passed without a storm: something was sure to be wrong with his coffee, his milk, his dish of macaroni, which he insisted on having served to him daily. There were constant quarrels in the house. The chef had spoilt his polenta; the coachman had given him a bad driver to bring him over to see me; the dogs had barked all night; there had been more guests than usual, and he had been obliged to eat at a side table; a hunting-horn had tortured his ear with discordant sounds; the curé had been trying to convert him; Count Waldstein had not said good morning to him first; the soup, out of malice prepense, had been served to him too hot, or too cold; a servant had kept him waiting for his wine; he had not been introduced to some distinguished person who had come to see the lance which pierced the side of the great Waldstein; the count had lent some one a book without telling him; a groom had not touched his hat to him; he had spoken in German and not been understood; he had got angry and people laughed at him. The fact of the matter was, that people laughed at him for many reasons. When he showed his French verses they laughed. When he declaimed Italian verses with much gesticulation, they laughed; when he came into the salon and bowed in the style which Marcel, the famous dancing-master, had taught him sixty years before, they laughed. When at all the balls he danced a minuet in a grave and stately manner, they laughed. When he put on his befeathered hat, his cloth of gold coat, his black velvet vest, his buckles with paste diamonds, worn over rolled silk stockings, they laughed.

'Cospetto!' said he; 'low scoundrels that you are! You are all Jacobins, you are wanting in respect to the count, and the count is wanting in respect to me when he fails to punish you.'

'Sir,' he said one day to the count, 'I wounded a great Polish general in the belly. I may not be a gentleman by birth, but I have raised myself to the position of one.'

The count laughed, which was another grievance.

One morning the count went into his room with a pair of pistols in his hand, and looked at him seriously, though he was inwardly dying with laughter. Casanova burst into tears, and fell on his shoulder. 'What!' he said, 'should I kill my benefactor—O che bella cosa!'

Then, thinking that he would be suspected of cowardice, he took up the pistols and returned them gracefully to the count, holding his hand at the level of his eyebrow, as one does in a minuet; then he wept a little more and fell to talking of magic and macaroni.

All the mothers in the village complained of his talking nonsense to their little girls!

He managed to involve the count in a quarrel with the monks at the Abbey of Ossegg, which he called, for some reason known only to himself, Calvados. When he got indigestion from overeating, he declared he was poisoned by the Jacobins! He bought a quantity of cloth on credit from the count's factory at Oberleitersdorf, and flew in a rage when asked for the money.

He could not endure so much persecution! God ordered him to leave Dux! By the way, he always pretended that everything he did was by God's order. God ordered him to ask me for letters of introduction to the Duke of Weimar, who is very fond of me, for the Duchess of Gotha, who does not know me, and for the Jews in Berlin.

He went off secretly, leaving a tender, proud, honest, and irate letter behind for Waldstein, who laughed and said he would be sure to come back some day.

Poor fellow, they did not offer him a place as tutor, or librarian, or chamberlain, but kept him cooling his heels in the anterooms, and he revenged himself by proclaiming loudly that all Germans are stupid. The excellent and amiable Duke of Weimar received him marvellously well, but he instantly became jealous of Goethe and Wieland, and declaimed against them and the literature of the country of which he knew nothing! At Berlin he launched his diatribes against the ignorance, superstition, and dishonesty of the Hebrews I had sent him to, which did not prevent him from borrowing money from them and giving them bills drawn on Waldstein in exchange. My nephew laughed, paid them, and embraced him when he returned. As for Casanova, he laughed and wept at the same time, and said that God had told him to take a six weeks' voyage, to go off without saying a word, and then come quietly back to his room at Dux. He told us all that had happened to him, including these little contrarieties, which he dignified with the name of humiliations.

A week after he returned there were fresh disturbances. The strawberries were handed to every one before him at table, and none left for him; and worse still, a portrait of himself which had disappeared from his room, and which he flattered himself had been taken by an admirer, suddenly reappeared, hung up in an inferior and degrading position. Thus he went on, agitating himself, grieving, groaning over the conquest of his ungrateful country; talking to us of the League of Cambray and the glories of the ancient and superb city of Venice, which had hitherto resisted all Europe. His appetite began to diminish, he ceased to regret life, and he ended nobly enough, at peace with God and man.

APPENDIX

THUS abruptly end the Memoirs of Giacome Casanova, Chevalier de Seingalt, Knight of the Golden Spur, Prothonotary Apostolic, and Scoundrel Cosmopolitic.

Whether the author died before the work was complete, whether the concluding volumes were destroyed by himself or his literary executors, or whether the MS. fell into bad hands, seems a matter of uncertainty, and the materials available towards a continuation of the Memoirs are extremely fragmentary. We know, however, that Casanova at last succeeded in obtaining his pardon from the authorities of the Republic, and he returned to Venice, where he exercised the honourable office of secret agent of the State Inquisitors—in plain language, he became a spy. It seems that the Knight of the Golden Spur made a rather indifferent "agent;" not surely, as a French writer suggests, because the dirty work was too dirty for his fingers, but probably because he was getting old and stupid and out-of-date, and failed to keep in touch with new forms of turpitude. He left Venice again and paid a visit to Vienna, saw beloved Paris once more, and there met Count Wallenstein, or Waldstein. The conversation turned on magic and the occult sciences, in which Casanova was an adept, as the reader of the Memoirs will remember, and the count took a fancy to the charlatan. In short Casanova became librarian at the count's Castle of Dux, near Teplitz, and there he spent the fourteen remaining years of his life.

As the Prince de Ligne (from whose Memoirs we learn these particulars) remarks, Casanova's life had been a stormy and adventurous one, and it might have been expected that he would have found his patron's library a pleasant refuge after so many toils and travels. But the man carried rough weather and storm in his own heart, and found daily opportunities of mortification and resentment. The coffee was ill made, the maccaroni not cooked in the true Italian style, the dogs had bayed during the night, he had been made to dine at a small table, the parish priest had tried to convert him, the soup had been served too hot on purpose to annoy him, he had not been introduced to a distinguished guest, the count had lent a book without telling him, a groom had not taken off his hat; such were his complaints. The fact is Casanova felt his dependent position and his utter poverty, and was all the more determined to stand to his dignity as a man who had talked with all the crowned heads of Europe, and had fought a duel with the Polish general. And he had another reason for finding life bitter—he had lived beyond his time. Louis XV. was dead, and Louis XVI. had been guillotined; the Revolution had come; and Casanova, his dress, and his manners, appeared as odd and antique as some "blood of the Regency" would appear to us of these days. Sixty years before, Marcel, the famous dancing-master, had taught young Casanova how to enter a room with a lowly and ceremonious bow; and still, though the eighteenth century is drawning to a close, old Casanova enters the rooms of Dux with the same stately bow, but now everyone laughs. Old Casanova treads the grave measures of the minuet; they applauded his dancing once, but now everyone laughs. Young Casanova was always dressed in the height of the fashion; but the age of powder, wigs, velvets, and silks has departed, and old Casanova's attempts at elegance ("Strass" diamonds have replaced the genuine stones with him) are likewise greeted with laughter. No wonder the old adventurer denounces the whole house of Jacobins and canaille; the world, he feels, is permanently out of joint for him; everything is cross, and everyone is in a conspiracy to drive the iron into his soul.

At last these persecutions, real or imaginary, drive him away from Dux; he considers his genius bids him go, and, as before, he obeys. Casanova has but little pleasure or profit out of this his last journey; he has to dance attendance in ante-chambers; no one will give him any office, whether as tutor, librarian, or chamberlain. In one quarter only is he well received—namely, by the famous Duke of Weimar; but in a few days he becomes madly jealous of the duke's more famous protégés, Goethe and Wieland, and goes off declaiming against them and German literature generally—with which literature he was wholly unacquainted. From Weimar to Berlin; where there are Jews to whom he has introductions. Casanova thinks them ignorant, superstitious, and knavish; but they lend him money, and he gives bills on Count Wallenstein, which are paid. In six weeks the wanderer returns to Dux, and is welcomed with open arms; his journeys are over at last.

But not his troubles. A week after his return there are strawberries at dessert; everyone is served before himself, and when the plate comes round to him it is empty. Worse still: his portrait is missing from his room, and is discovered salement placardé à la porte des lieux d'aisance!

Five more years of life remained to him. They were passed in such petty mortifications as we have narrated, in grieving over his affreuse vieillesse, and in laments over the conquest of his native land Venice, once so splendid and powerful. His appetite began to fail, and with it failed his last source of pleasure, so death came to him somewhat as a release. He received the sacraments with devotion, exclaimed,——

'Grand Dieu, et vous tous témoins de ma mort, j'ai vécu en philosophe, et je meurs en Chrétien," and so died.

It was a quiet ending to a wonderfully brilliant and entirely useless career. It has been suggested that if the age in which Casanova lived had been less corrupt, he himself might have used his all but universal talents to some advantage, but to our mind Casanova would always have remained Casanova. He came of a family of adventurers, and the reader of his Memoirs will remark how he continually ruined his prospects by his ineradicable love for disreputable company. His "Bohemianism" was in his blood, and in his old age he regrets—not his past follies, but his inability to commit folly any longer. Now and again we are inclined to pronounce Casanova to be an amiable man; and if to his generosity and good nature he had added some elementary knowledge of the distinction between right and wrong, he might certainly have laid some claim to the character. The Prince de Ligne draws the following portrait of him under the name of Aventuros:

"He would be a handsome man if he were not ugly; he is tall and strongly built, but his dark complexion and his glittering eyes give him a fierce expression. He is easier to annoy than amuse; he laughs little but makes others laugh by the peculiar turn he gives to his conversation. He knows everything except those matters on the knowledge of which he chiefly prides himself, namely, dancing, the French language, good taste, and knowledge of the world. Everything about him is comic, except his comedies; and all his writings are philosophical, saving those which treat of philosophy. He is a perfect well of knowledge, but he quotes Homer and Horace ad nauseam."

VENICE

CASANOVA'S RETURN TO VENICE

Thus Casanova ended his Memoirs, concluding his narrative with his sojourn at Trieste, in January 1774, where he had remained, except for a few excursions, since the 15th November 1772. He was forty-nine years of age. Since his unfortunate experiences in England, the loss of his fortune and the failure of his efforts to obtain congenial and remunerative employment in Germany or Russia, he had come to concentrate his efforts on a return to his native city.

Of his faithful friends, the nobles Bragadin, Barbaro and Dandolo, the first had died in 1767, having gone into debt "that I might have enough," sending Casanova, from his death-bed, a last gift of a thousand crowns. Barbaro who had died also, in 1771, left Casanova a life-income of six sequins a month. The survivor, Dandolo, was poor, but until his death, he also gave Casanova a monthly provision of six sequins.

However, Casanova was not without influential friends who might not only obtain a pardon from the State Inquisitors but also assist him to employment; and, in fact, it was through such influence as that wielded by the Avogador Zaguri and the Procurator Morosini, that Casanova received his pardon, and later, a position as "Confidant," or Secret Agent, to the Inquisitors at Venice.

Casanova re-entered Venice the 14th September 1774 and, presenting himself, on the 18th, to Marc-Antoine Businello, Secretary of the Tribunal of the Inquisitors of State, was advised that mercy had been accorded him by reason of his refutation of the History of the Venetian Government by Amelot de la Houssaie which he had written during his forty-two day imprisonment at Barcelona in 1768. The three Inquisitors, Francesco Grimani, Francesco Sagredo and Paolo Bembo, invited him to dinner to hear his story of his escape from The Leads.

In 1772, Bandiera, the Republic's resident at Ancona, drew this portrait of Casanova:

"One sees everywhere this unhappy rebel against the justice of the August Council, presenting himself boldly, his head carried high, and well equipped. He is received in many houses and announces his intention of going to Trieste and, from there, of returning to Germany. He is a man of forty years or more," [in reality, forty-seven] "of high stature and excellent appearance, vigorous, of a very brown color, the eye bright, the wig short and chestnut-brown. He is said to be haughty and disdainful; he speaks at length, with spirit and erudition." [Letter of information to the Very Illustrious Giovanni Zon, Secretary of the August Council of Ten at Venice. 2 October 1772.]

Returning to Venice after an absence of eighteen years, Casanova renewed his acquaintance with many old friends, among whom were:

The Christine of the Memoirs. Charles, who married Christine, the marriage being arranged by Casanova while in Venice in 1747, was of financial assistance to Casanova, who "found him a true friend." Charles died "a few months before my last departure from Venice," in 1783.

Mlle. X . . . C . . . V . . ., really Giustina de Wynne, widow of the Count Rosenberg, Austrian Ambassador at Venice. "Fifteen years afterwards, I saw her again and she was a widow, happy enough, apparently, and enjoying a great reputation on account of her rank, wit and social qualities, but our connection was never renewed."

Callimena, who was kind to him "for love's sake alone" at Sorrento in 1770.

Marcoline, the girl he took away from his younger brother, the Abbé Casanova, at Geneva in 1763.

Father Balbi, the companion of his flight from The Leads.

Doctor Gozzi, his former teacher at Padua, now become Arch-Priest of St. George of the Valley, and his sister Bettina. "When I went to pay him a visit . . . she breathed her last in my arms, in 1776, twenty-four hours after my arrival. I will speak of her death in due time."

Angela Toselli, his first passion. In 1758 this girl married the advocate Francesco Barnaba Rizzotti, and in the following year she gave birth to a daughter, Maria Rizzotti (later married to a M. Kaiser) who lived at Vienna and whose letters to Casanova were preserved at Dux.

C . . . C . . ., the young girl whose love affair with Casanova became involved with that of the nun M . . . M . . . Casanova found her in Venice "a widow and poorly off."

The dancing girl Binetti, who assisted Casanova in his flight from Stuttgart in 1760, whom he met again in London in 1763, and who was the cause of his duel with Count Branicki at Warsaw in 1766. She danced frequently at Venice between 1769 and 1780.

The good and indulgent Mme. Manzoni, "of whom I shall have to speak very often."

The patricians Andrea Memmo and his brother Bernardo who, with P. Zaguri were personages of considerable standing in the Republic and who remained his constant friends. Andrea Memmo was the cause of the embarrassment in which Mlle. X . . . C . . . V . . . found herself in Paris and which Casanova vainly endeavored to remove by applications of his astonishing specific, the aroph of Paracelsus.

It was at the house of these friends that Casanova became acquainted with the poet, Lorenzo Da Ponte. "I made his acquaintance," says the latter, in his own Memoirs, "at the house of Zaguri and the house of Memmo, who both sought after his always interesting conversation, accepting from this man all he had of good, and closing their eyes, on account of his genius, upon the perverse parts of his nature."

Lorenzo Da Ponte, known above all as Mozart's librettist, and whose youth much resembled that of Casanova, was accused of having eaten ham on Friday and was obliged to flee from Venice in 1777, to escape the punishment of the Tribunal of Blasphemies. In his Memoirs, he speaks unsparingly of his compatriot and yet, as M. Rava notes, in the numerous letters he wrote Casanova, and which were preserved at Dux, he proclaims his friendship and admiration.

Irene Rinaldi, whom he met again at Padua in 1777, with her daughter who "had become a charming girl; and our acquaintance was renewed in the tenderest manner."

The ballet-girl Adelaide, daughter of Mme. Soavi, who was also a dancer, and of a M. de Marigny.

Barbara, who attracted Casanova's attention at Trieste, in 1773, while he was frequenting a family named Leo, but toward whom he had maintained an attitude of respect. This girl, on meeting him again in 1777, declared that "she had guessed my real feelings and had been amused by my foolish restraint."

At Pesaro, the Jewess Leah, with whom he had the most singular experiences at Ancona in 1772.

II

RELATIONS WITH THE INQUISITORS

Soon after reaching Venice, Casanova learned that the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, following the example of other German princes, wished a Venetian correspondent for his private affairs. Through some influence he believed he might obtain this small employment; but before applying for the position he applied to the Secretary of the Tribunal for permission. Apparently nothing came of this, and Casanova obtained no definite employment until 1776.

Early in 1776, Casanova entered the service of the Tribunal of Inquisitors as an "occasional Confidant," under the fictitious name of Antonio Pratiloni, giving his address as "at the Casino of S. E. Marco Dandolo."

In October 1780, his appointment was more definitely established and he was given a salary of fifteen ducats a month. This, with the six sequins of life-income left by Barbaro and the six given by Dandolo, gave him a monthly income of three hundred and eighty-four lires—about seventy-four U. S. dollars—from 1780 until his break with the Tribunal at the end of 1781.

In the Archives of Venice are preserved forty-eight letters from Casanova, including the Reports he wrote as a "Confidant," all in the same handwriting as the manuscript of the Memoirs. The Reports may be divided into two classes: those referring to commercial or industrial matters, and those referring to the public morals.

Among those of the first class, we find:

A Report relating to Casanova's success in having a change made in the route of the weekly diligence running from Trieste to Mestre, for which service, rendered during Casanova's residence at Trieste in 1773, he received encouragement and the sum of one hundred ducats from the Tribunal.

A Report, the 8th September 1776, with information concerning the rumored project of the future Emperor of Austria to invade Dalmatia after the death of Maria Theresa. Casanova stated he had received this information from a Frenchman, M. Salz de Chalabre, whom he had known in Paris twenty years before. This M. Chalabre [printed Calabre] was the pretended nephew of Mme. Amelin. "This young man was as like her as two drops of water, but she did not find that a sufficient reason for avowing herself his mother." The boy was, in fact, the son of Mme. Amelin and of M. de Chalabre, who had lived together for a long time.

A Report, the 12th of December 1776, of a secret mission to Trieste, in regard to a project of the court of Vienna for making Fiume a French port; the object being to facilitate communications between this port and the interior of Hungary. For this inquiry, Casanova received sixteen hundred lires, his expenditures amounting to seven hundred and sixty-six lires.

A Report, May-July 1779, of an excursion in the market of Ancona for information concerning the commercial relations of the Pontifical States with the Republic of Venice. At Forli, in the course of this excursion, Casanova visited the dancing-girl Binetti. For this mission Casanova received forty-eight sequins.

A Report, January 1780, remarking a clandestine recruiting carried out by a certain Marrazzani for the [Prussian] regiment of Zarembal.

A Report, the 11th October 1781, regarding a so-called Baldassare Rossetti, a Venetian subject living at Trieste, whose activities and projects were of a nature to prejudice the commerce and industry of the Republic.

Among the Reports relating to public morals may be noted:

December 1776. A Report on the seditious character of a ballet called "Coriolanus." The back of this report is inscribed: "The impressario of S. Benedetto, Michel de l'Agata, shall be summoned immediately; it has been ordered that he cease, under penalty of his life, from giving the ballet Coriolanus at the theater. Further, he is to collect and deposit all the printed programmes of this ballet."

December 1780. A Report calling to the attention of the Tribunal the scandalous disorders produced in the theaters when the lights were extinguished.

3rd May 1781. A Report remarking that the Abbé Carlo Grimani believed himself exempt, in his position as a priest, from the interdiction laid on patricians against frequenting foreign ministers and their suites. On the back of this Report is written: "Ser Jean Carlo, Abbé Grimani, to be gently reminded, by the Secretary, of the injunction to abstain from all commerce with foreign ministers and their adherents."

Venetian nobles were forbidden under penalty of death from holding any communication with foreign ambassadors or their households. This was intended as a precaution to preserve the secrets of the Senate.

26th November 1781. A Report concerning a painting academy where nude studies were made, from models of both sexes, while scholars only twelve or thirteen years of age were admitted, and where dilettantes who were neither painters nor designers, attended the sessions.

22nd December 1781. By order, Casanova reported to the Tribunal a list of the principal licentious or anti-religious books to be found in the libraries and private collections at Venice: la Pucelle; la Philosophie de l'Histoire; l'Esprit d'Helvétius; la Sainte Chandelle d'Arras; les Bijoux indiscrets; le Portier des Chârtreux; les Poésies de Baffo; Ode à Priape; de Piron; etc., etc.

In considering this Report, which has been the subject of violent criticism, we should bear in mind three points: first—the Inquisitors required this information; second—no one in their employ could have been in a better position to give it than Casanova; third—Casanova was morally and economically bound, as an employee of the Tribunal, to furnish the information ordered, whatever his personal distaste for the undertaking may have been. We may even assume that he permitted himself to express his feelings in some indiscreet way, and his break with the Tribunal followed, for, at the end of 1781, his commission was withdrawn. Certainly, Casanova's almost absolute dependence on his salary, influenced the letter he wrote the Inquisitors at this time.

"To the Illustrious and Most Excellent Lords, the Inquisitors of State:

"Filled with confusion, overwhelmed with sorrow and repentance, recognizing myself absolutely unworthy of addressing my vile letter to Your Excellencies, confessing that I have failed in my duty in the opportunities which presented themselves, I, Jacques Casanova, invoke, on my knees, the mercy of the Prince; I beg that, in compassion and grace, there may be accorded me that which, in all justice and on reflection, may be refused me.

"I ask the Sovereign Munificence to come to my aid, so that, with the means of subsistence, I may apply myself vigorously, in the future, to the service to which I have been privileged.

"After this respectful supplication, the wisdom of Your Excellencies may judge the disposition of my spirit and of my intentions.

The Inquisitors decided to award Casanova one month's pay, but specified that thereafter he would receive salary only when he rendered important services.

In 1782 Casanova made a few more Reports to the Tribunal, for one of which, regarding the failure of an insurance and commercial house at Trieste, he received six sequins. But the part of a guardian of the public morals, even through necessity, was undoubtedly unpleasant to him; and, in spite of the financial loss, it may be that his release was a relief.

III

FRANCESCA BUSCHINI

Intimately connected with Casanova's life at this period was a girl named Francesca Buschini. This name does not appear in any of the literary, artistic or theatrical records of the period, and, of the girl, nothing is known other than that which she herself tells us in her letters to Casanova. From these very human letters, however, we may obtain, not only certain facts, but also, a very excellent idea of her character. Thirty-two of her letters, dated between July 1779 and October 1787, written in the Venetian dialect, were preserved in the library at Dux.

She was a seamstress, although often without work, and had a brother, a younger sister and also a mother living with her. The probabilities are that she was a girl of the most usual sort, but greatly attached to Casanova who, even in his poverty, must have dazzled her as a being from another world. She was his last Venetian love, and remained a faithful correspondent until 1787; and it is chiefly from her letters, in which she comments on news contained in Casanova's letters to her, that light is thrown on the Vienna-Paris period, particularly, of Casanova's life. For this, Francesca has placed us greatly in her debt.

With this girl, at least between 1779 and 1782, Casanova rented a small house at Barbaria delle Tole, near S. Giustina, from the noble Pesaro at S. Stae. Casanova, always in demand for his wit and learning, often took dinner in the city. He knew that a place always awaited him at the house of Memmo and at that of Zaguri and that, at the table of these patricians, who were distinguished by their intellectual superiority, he would meet men notable in science and letters. Being so long and so closely connected with theatrical circles, he was often seen at the theater, with Francesca. Thus, the 9th August 1786, the poor girl, in an excess of chagrin writes: "Where are all the pleasures which formerly you procured me? Where are the theatres, the comedies which we once saw together?"

On the 28th July 1779, Francesca wrote:

"Dearest and best beloved,

" . . . In the way of novelties, I find nothing except that S. E. Pietro Zaguri has arrived at Venice; his servant has been twice to ask for you, and I have said you were still at the Baths of Abano . . ."

The Casanova-Buschini establishment kept up relations, more or less frequent and intimate, with a few persons, most of whom are mentioned in Francesca's letters; the Signora Anzoletta Rizzotti; the Signora Elisabeth Catrolli, an ancient comédienne; the Signora Bepa Pezzana; the Signora Zenobia de Monti, possibly the mother of that Carlo de Monti, Venetian Consul at Trieste, who was a friend to Casanova and certainly contributed toward obtaining his pardon from the Inquisitors; a M. Lunel, master of languages, and his wife.

PUBLICATIONS

Casanova's principal writings during this period were:

His translation of the Iliad, the first volume of which was issued in 1775, the second in 1777 and the third in 1778.

During his stay at Abano in 1779, he wrote the Scrutinio del libro, eulogies of M. de Voltaire "by various hands." In the dedication of this book, to the Doge Renier, he wrote, "This little book has recently come from my inexperienced pen, in the hours of leisure which are frequent at Abano for those who do not come only for the baths."

From January until July 1780, he published, anonymously, a series of miscellaneous small works, seven pamphlets of about one hundred pages each, distributed at irregular intervals to subscribers.

From the 7th October to the end of December, 1780, on the occasions of the representations given by a troupe of French comedians at the San Angelo theater, Casanova wrote a little paper called The Messenger of Thalia. In one of the numbers, he wrote:

> "French is not my tongue; I make no pretentions and, wrong or astray, I place on the paper what heaven sends from my pen. I give birth to phrases turned to Italian, either to see what they look like or to produce a style, and often, also, to draw, into a purist's snare, some critical doctor who does not know my humor or how my offense amuses me."

The "little romance" referred to in the following letter to "Mlle. X . . . C . . . V . . . ," appeared in 1782, with the title; Di anecdoti vinizani militari e amorosi del secolo decimo quarto sotto i dogati di Giovanni Gradenigoe di Giovanni Dolfin. Venezia, 1782.

MLLE. X . . . C . . . V . . .

In 1782, a letter written by this lady, Giustina de Wynne, referring to a visit to Venice of Paul I, Grand Duke, afterward Emperor of Russia, and his wife, was published under the title of Du sejour des Comptes du Nord à Venise en janvier mdcclxxxii. If he had not previously done so, Casanova took this occasion to recall himself to the memory of this lady to whom he had once been of such great service. And two very polite letters were exchanged:

"Madam,

"The fine epistle which V. E. has allowed to be printed upon the sojourn of C. and of the C. du Nord in this city, exposes you, in the position of an author, to endure the compliments of all those who trouble themselves to write. But I flatter myself, Madam, that V. E. will not disdain mine.

"The little romance, Madam, a translation from my dull and rigid pen, is not a gift but a very paltry offering which I dare make to the superiority of your merit.

"I have found, Madam, in your letter, the simple, flowing style of gentility, the one which alone a woman of condition who writes to her friend may use with dignity. Your digressions and your thoughts are flowers which . . . (forgive an author who pilfers from you the delicious nonchalance of an amiable writer) or . . . a will-o'-the-wisp which, from time to time, issues from the work, in spite of the author, and burns the paper.

"I aspire, Madam, to render myself favorable to the deity to which reason advises me to make homage. Accept then the offering and render happy he who makes it with your indulgence.

"I have the honor to sign myself, if you will kindly permit me, with very profound respect.

Giacomo Casanova."

"Monsieur:

"I am very sensible, Monsieur, of the distinction which comes to me from your approbation of my little pamphlet. The interest of the moment, its references and the exaltation of spirits have gained for it the tolerance and favorable welcome of the good Venetians. It is to your politeness in particular, Monsieur, that I believe is due the marked success which my work has had with you. I thank you for the book which you sent me and I will risk thanking you in advance for the pleasure it will give me. Be persuaded of my esteem for yourself and for your talents. And I have the honor to be, Monsieur.

Your very humble servant
de Wynne de Rosemberg."

Among Casanova's papers at Dux was a page headed "Souvenir," dated the 2d September 1791, and beginning: "While descending the staircase, the Prince de Rosemberg told me that Madame de Rosemberg was dead. . . . This Prince de Rosemberg was the nephew of Giustina."

Giustina died, after a long illness, at Padua, the 21st August 1791, at the age of fifty-four years and seven months.

LAST DAYS AT VENICE

Toward the end of 1782, doubtless convinced that he could expect nothing more from the Tribunal, Casanova entered the service of the Marquis Spinola as a secretary. Some years before, a certain Carletti, an officer in the service of the court of Turin, had won from the Marquis a wager of two hundred and fifty sequins. The existence of this debt seemed to have completely disappeared from the memory of the loser. By means of the firm promise of a pecuniary recompense, Casanova intervened to obtain from his patron a written acknowledgment of the debt owing to Carletti. His effort was successful; but instead of clinking cash, Carletti contented himself with remitting to the negotiator an assignment on the amount of the credit. Casanova's anger caused a violent dispute, in the course of which Carlo Grimani, at whose house the scene took place, placed him in the wrong and imposed silence.

The irascible Giacomo conceived a quick resentment. To discharge his bile, he found nothing less than to publish in the course of the month of August, under the title of: Ne amori ne donne ovvero la Stalla d'Angia repulita, a libel in which Jean Carlo Grimani, Carletti, and other notable persons were outraged under transparent mythological pseudonyms.

This writing embroiled the author with the entire body of the Venetian nobility.

To allow the indignation against him to quiet down, Casanova went to pass some days at Trieste, then returned to Venice to put his affairs in order. The idea of recommencing his wandering life alarmed him. "I have lived fifty-eight years," he wrote, "I could not go on foot with winter at hand, and when I think of starting on the road to resume my adventurous life, I laugh at myself in the mirror."

VENICE
I. Casanova's Return to Venice

THE Memoirs end with the beginning of January 1774, with Casanova at Trieste where he had remained, except for a few excursions, since the 15th Nov. 1772. He was forty-nine years of age. Since his unfortunate experiences in England, the loss of his fortune and the failure of his efforts to obtain congenial and renumerative employment in Germany or Russia, he had come to concentrate his efforts on a return to his native city.

Of his faithful friends, the nobles Bragadin, Barbaro and Dandolo, the first had died in 1787, having gone into debt "that I might have enough", sending Casanova, from his death-bed, a last gift of a thousand crowns. (XI, 2) Barbaro had died also in 1771, leaving Casanova a life-income of six sequins a month. The survivor, Dandolo, was poor but, until his death, he also gave Casanova a monthly provision of six sequins.

However, Casanova was not without influential friends who might not only obtain a pardon from the State Inquisitors but also assist him to employment. And, in fact, it was through such influence as that wielded by the Avogador Zaguri and the Procurator Morosini that Casanova received his pardon, and later, a position as "Confidant", or Secret agent, to the Inquisitors at Venice.

Casanova re-entered Venice the 14th September 1774 and, presenting himself, on the 18th, to Marc-Antoine Businello, Secretary of the Tribunal of the Inquisitors of State, was advised that mercy had been accorded him by reason of his "Refutation of the History of the Venetian Government by Amelot de La Houssaie" which he had written during his forty-two day imprisonment at Barcelona in 1768 (XI, 8). The three Inquisitors, Francesco Grimani, Francesco Sagredo and Paolo Bembo, invited him to dinner to hear his story of his escape from The Leads.

In 1772, Bandiera, the Republic's resident at Ancona, drew this portrait of Casanova:

"One sees everywhere this unhappy rebel against the justice of the August Council, presenting himself boldly, his head carried high, and well equipped. He is received in many houses and announces his intention of going to Trieste and, from there, of returning to Germany. He is a man of forty years or more" (in reality, forty-seven), "of high stature and excellent appearance, vigorous, of a very brown color, the eye bright, the wig short and chestnut-brown. He is said to be haughty and disdainful; he speaks at length, with spirit and erudition." (Letter of information to the Very Illustrious Giovanni Zon, Secretary of the August Council of Ten at Venice. 2 October 1772.)

Returning to Venice after an absence of eighteen years, Casanova renewed his acquaintance with many old friends, among whom were:

The Christine of the Memoirs. Charles, who married Christine, the marriage being arranged by Casanova while in Venice in 1747, was of financial assistance to Casanova, who "found him a true friend". (II, 7) Charles died "a few months before my last departure from Venice", in 1783.

Mlle X . . C . . V . . (V, 6-8), really Giustina de Wynne, widow of the Count Rosemberg, Austrian Ambassador at Venice.

"Fifteen years afterwards, I saw her again and she was a widow, happy enough, apparently, and enjoying a great reputation on account of her rank, wit and social qualities, but our connection was never renewed." (V, 9).

Callimena, who was kind to him "for love's sake alone" at Sorrento in 1770. (XII, 3).

Marcoline, the girl he took away from his younger brother, the Abbè Casanova, at Geneva in 1763 (IX, 2).

Father Balbi, the companion of his flight from The Leads. (IV, 9 etc.).

Doctor Gozzi, his former teacher at Padua, now become Arch-Priest of St. George of the Valley, and his sister Bettina. "When I went to pay him a visit . . she breathed her last in my arms, in 1776, twenty-four hours after my arrival. I will speak of her death in due time." (I, 3).

Angela Toselli, his first passion (I, 4 etc.). In 1758 this girl married the advocate Francesco Barnaba Rizzotti. And in the following year she gave birth to a daughter, Maria Rizzotti (later married to an M.

Kaiser) who lived at Vienna and whose letters to Casanova were preserved at Dux.

C . . C . . , the young girl whose love affair with Casanova became involved with that of the nun M . . M . . . Casanova found her in Venice "a widow and poorly off." (IV, 8).

The dancing girl Binetti, who assisted Casanova in his flight from Stuttgart in 1760 (IV, 2), whom he met again in London in 1763 (IX, 8) and who was the cause of his duel with Count Branicki at Warsaw in 1766 (X, 11). She danced frequently at Venice between 1769 and 1780.

The good and indulgent Mme. Manzoni, "of whom I shall have to speak very often" (I, 4).

The patricians Andrea Memmo (IX, 5) and his brother Bernardo who, with P. Zaguri (XII, 9) were personages of considerable standing in the Republic and who remained his constant friends. Andrea Memmo was the cause of the embarrassment in which Mlle. X . . C . . V . . found herself in Paris and which Casanova vainly endeavored to remove by applications of his astonishing specific, the aroph of Paracelsus (V, 7 etc.).

It was at the house of these friends that Casanova became acquainted with the Poet, Lorenzo Da Ponte. "I made his acquaintance", says the latter, in his own Memoirs, "at the house of Zaguri and the house of Memmo, who both sought after his always interesting conversation, accepting from this man all he had of good, and closing their eyes, on account of his genius, upon the perverse parts of his nature."

Lorenzo Da Ponte, known above all as Mozart's librettist, and whose youth much resembled that of Casanova, was accused of having eaten ham on Friday and was obliged to flee from Venice in 1777, to escape the punishment of the Tribunal of Blasphemies. In his Memoirs, he speaks unsparingly of his compatriot and yet, as M. Rava notes, in the numerous letters he wrote Casanova, and which were preserved at Dux, he proclaims his friendship and admiration.

Irene Rinaldi (VIII, 7. IX, 4), whom he met again at Padua in 1777, with her daughter who "had become a charming girl; and our acquaintance was renewed in the tenderest manner." (XII, 13).

The ballet-girl Adelaide (XII, 10), daughter of Mme. Soavi, who was also a dancer, and of a M. de Marigny.

Barbara, who attracted Casanova's attention at Trieste in 1773, while he was frequenting a family named Leo, but toward whom he had maintained an attitude of respect. This girl, on meeting him again in 1777, declared that "she had guessed my real feelings and had been amused by my foolish restraint." (XII, 12).

At Pesaro, the jewess Leah, with whom he had the most singular experiences at Ancona in 1772. (XII, 11).

II. Relations With the Inquisitors.

Soon after reaching Venice, Casanova learned that the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, following the example of other German princes, wished a Venetian correspondent for his private affairs. Through some influence he believed he might obtain this small employment; but before applying for the position he applied to the Secretary of the Tribunal for permission. Apparently nothing came of this, and Casanova obtained no definite employment until 1776.

Early in 1776, Casanova entered the service of the Tribunal of Inquisitors as an "occasional Confidant", under the fictitious name of Antonio Pratiloni, giving his address as "at the Casino of S. E. Marco Dandolo."

In October 1780, his appointment was more definitely established and he was given a salary of fifteen ducats a month. This, with the six sequins of life income left by Barbaro and the six given by Dandolo, gave him a monthly income of three hundred and eighty-four lires—about seventy-four U. S. dollars—from 1780 until his break with the Tribunal at the end of 1781.

In the Archives of Venice are preserved forty-eight letters from Casanova, including the reports he wrote as a "Confidant", all in the same hand-writing as the MS. of the Memoirs. The reports may be divided into two classes: those referring to commercial or industrial matters, and those referring to the public morals.

Among those of the first class, we find:

A report relating to Casanova's success in having a change made in the route of the weekly diligence running from Trieste to Mestre (XII, 12), for which service, rendered during Casanova's residence at Trieste in 1773, he received encouragement and the sum of one hundred ducats from the Tribunal.

A report, the 8th Sept. 1776, with information concerning the rumored project of the future Emperor of Austria to invade Dalmatia after the death of Maria Theresa. Casanova stated he had received this information from a Frenchman, M. Salz de Chalabre, whom he had known in Paris twenty years before. This M. Chalabre (printed Calabre) was the pretended nephew of Mme. Amelin (V, 1). "This young man was as like her as two drops of water, but she did not find that a sufficient reason for avowing herself his mother." The boy was, in fact, the son of Mme. Amelin and of M. de Chalabre, who had lived together for a long time.

A report, the 12th of December 1776, of a secret mission to Trieste, in regard to a project of the court of Vienna for making Fiume a French port; the object being to facilitate communications between this port and the interior of Hungary. For this inquiry, Casanova received sixteen hundred lires, his expenditures amounting to seven hundred and sixty-six lires.

A report, May-July 1779, of an excursion in the market of Ancona for information concerning the commercial relations of the Pontifical States with the Republic of Venice. At Forli, in the course of this excursion, Casanova visited the dancing-girl Binetti. For this mission Casanova received forty-eight sequins.

A report, Jan. 1780, remarking a clandestine recruiting carried out by a certain Marrazzani for the (Prussian) regiment of Zarembal.

A report the 11th Oct. 1781 regarding a so-called Baldassare Rossetti, a Venetian subject living at Trieste, whose activities and projects were of a nature to prejudice the commerce and industry of the Republic.

Among the reports relating to public morals may be noted:

December 1776. A report on the seditious character of a ballet called "Coriolanus". The back of this report is inscribed: "The impressario of S. Benedetto, Michel de l'Agata, shall be summoned immediately; it has been ordered that he cease, under penalty of his life, from giving the ballet Coriolanus at the theater. Further, he is to collect and deposit all the printed programmes of this ballet."

December 1780. A report calling to the attention of the Tribunal the scandalous disorders produced in the theaters when the lights were extinguished.

3d May 1781. A report remarking that the Abbè Carlo Grimani believed himself exempt, in his position as a priest, from the interdiction laid on patricians against frequenting foreign ministers and their suites. On the back of this report is written: "Ser Jean Carlo, Abbè Grimani, to be gently reminded, by the Secretary, of the injunction to abstain from all commerce with foreign ministers and their adherents."

Venetian nobles were forbidden under penalty of death from holding any communication with foreign ambassadors or their households. This was intended as a precaution to preserve the secrets of the Senate.

26 November 1781. A report concerning a painting academy where nude studies were made, from models of both sexes, while scholars only twelve or thirteen years of age were admitted, and where dilettantes who were neither painters nor designers, attended the sessions.

22 December 1781. By order, Casanova reported to the Tribunal a list of the principal licentious or anti-religious books to be found in the libraries and private collections at Venice: la Pucelle, la Philosophie de l'Histoire, l'Esprit d'Helvétius, la Sainte Chandelle d'Arras, les Bijous indiscrets, le Portier des Chartreux, les Poésies de Baffo, Ode à Priape, de Piron, etc., etc.

In considering this report, which has been the subject of violent criticism we should bear in mind three points. 1) The Inquisitors required this information. 2) No one in their employ could have been in a better position to give it than Casanova. 3) Casanova was morally and economically bound, as an employee of the Tribunal, to furnish the information ordered, whatever his personal distaste for the undertaking may have been. We may even assume that he permitted himself to express his feelings in some indiscreet way, and his break with the Tribunal followed. For, at the end of 1781, his commission was withdrawn. Certainly, Casanova's almost absolute dependence on his salary, influenced the letter he wrote the Inquisitors at this time.

"To the Illustrious and Most Excellent Lords, the Inquisitors of State:

"Filled with confusion, overwhelmed with sorrow and repentance, recognizing myself absolutely unworthy of addressing my vile letter to Your Excellencies, confessing that I have failed in my duty in the opportunities which presented themselves, I, Jacques Casanova, invoke, on my knees, the mercy of the Prince; I beg that, in compassion and grace, there may be accorded me that which, in all justice and on reflection, may be refused me.

Digitized by Google

"I ask the Sovereign Munificience to come to my aid, so that, with the means of subsistence, I may apply myself vigorously, in the future, to the service to which I have been privileged.

"After this respectful supplication, the wisdom of Your Excellencies may judge the disposition of my spirit and of my intentions."

The Inquisitors decided to award Casanova one month's pay, but specified that thereafter he would receive salary only when he rendered important services.

In 1782 Casanova made a few more reports to the Tribunal, for one of which, regarding the failure of an insurance and commercial house at Trieste, he received six sequins. But the part of a guardian of the public morals, even through necessity, was undoubtedly unpleasant to him; and, in spite of the financial loss, it may be that his release was a relief.

III. Francesca Buschini.

Intimately connected with Casanova's life at this period was a girl named Francesca Buschini. This name does not appear in any of the literary, artistic or theatrical records of the period, and, of the girl, nothing is known other than that which she herself tells us in her letters to Casanova. The Casanova-Buschini establishment kept up relations, more or less frequent and intimate, with a few persons, most of whom are mentioned in Francesca's letters; the signora Anzoletta Rizotti; the signora Elisabeth Catrolli, an ancient comedienne; the signora Bepa Pezzana; the signora Zenobia de Monti, possibly the mother of that Carlo de Monti, Venetian Consul at Trieste, who was a friend to Casanova and certainly contributed toward obtaining his pardon from the Inquisitors (XII, 12); an M. PART THE SECOND

VIENNA—PARIS

I

Travels in 1783

Casanova left Venice in January 1783, and went to Vienna.

On the 16th April Elisabeth Catrolli wrote to him at Vienna:

"Dearest of friends,

"Your letter has given me great pleasure. Be assured, I infinitely regret your departure. I have but two sincere friends, yourself and Camerani. I do not hope for more. I could be happy if I could have at least one of you near me to whom I could confide my cruel anxieties.

"To-day, I received from Camerani a letter informing me that, in a former one, he had sent me a bill of exchange: I did not receive it, and I fear it has been lost.

"Dear friend, when you reach Paris, clasp him to your heart for me. .In regard to Chechina [Francesca Buschini] I would say that I have not seen her since the day I took her your letter. Her mother is the ruin of that poor girl; let that suffice; I will say no more. . . ."

After leaving Venice, Casanova apparently took an opportunity to pay his last disrespects to the Tribunal. At least, in May 1783, M. Schlick, French Secretary at Venice, wrote to Count Vergennes: "Last week there reached the State Inquisitors an anonymous letter stating that, on the 25th of this month, an earthquake, more terrible than that of Messina, would raze Venice to the ground. This letter has caused a panic here. Many patricians have left the capital and others will follow their example. The author of the anonymous letter . . . is a certain Casanova, who wrote from Vienna and found means to slip it into the Ambassador's own mails."

In about four months, Casanova was again on the way to Italy. He paused for a week at Udine and arrived at Venice on the 16th June. Without leaving his barge, he paused at his house just long enough to salute Francesca. He left Mestre on Tuesday the 24th June and on the same day dined at the house of F. Zanuzzi at Bassano. On the 25th he left Bassano by post and arrived in the evening at Borgo di Valsugano.

On the 29th, he wrote to Francesca from the Augsbourg. He had stopped at Innsbruck to attend the theater and was in perfect health. He had reached Frankfort in forty-eight hours, traveling eighteen posts without stopping.

From Aix-la-Chapelle, on the 16th July, he wrote Francesca that he had met, in that city, Cattina, the wife of Pocchini. Pocchini was sick and in deep misery. Casanova, recalling all the abominable tricks this rogue had played on him refused Cattina the assistance she begged for in tears, laughed in her face, and said: "Farewell, I wish you a pleasant death."

At Mayence, Casanova embarked on the Rhine in company with the Marquis Durazzo, former Austrian Ambassador at Venice. The voyage was excellent and in two days he arrived at Cologne, in rugged health, sleeping well and eating like a wolf.

On the 30th July he wrote to Francesca from Spa and in this letter enclosed a good coin. Everything was dear at Spa; his room cost eight lires a day with everything else in proportion.

On the 6th September he wrote from Antwerp to one of his good friends, the Abbé Eusebio della Lena, telling him that at Spa an English woman who had a passion for speaking Latin wished to submit him to trials which he judged it unnecessary to state precisely. He refused all her proposals, saying, however, that he would not reveal them to anyone; but that he did not feel he should refuse also "an order on her banker for twenty-five guineas."

On the 9th he wrote to Francesca from Brussels, and on the 12th he sent her a bill of exchange on the banker Corrado for one hundred and fifty lires. He said he had been intoxicated "because his reputation had required it." "This greatly astonishes me," Francesca responded, "for I have never seen you intoxicated nor even illuminated. . . . I am very happy that the wine drove away the inflammation in your teeth."

Practically all information of Casanova's movements in 1783 and 1784 is obtained from Francesca's letters which were in the library at Dux.

In her letters of the 27th June and 11th July, Francesca wrote Casanova that she had directed the Jew Abraham to sell Casanova's satin habit and velvet breeches, but could not hope for more than fifty lires because they were patched. Abraham had observed that at one time the habit had been placed in pledge with him by Casanova for three sequins.

On the 6th September, she wrote:

"With great pleasure, I reply to the three dear letters which you wrote me from Spa: the first of the 6th August, from which I learned that your departure had been delayed for some days to wait for someone who was to arrive in that city. I was happy that your appetite had returned, because good cheer is your greatest pleasure. . . .

"In your second letter which you wrote me from Spa on the 16th August, I noted with sorrow that your affairs were not going as you wished. But console yourself, dear friend, for happiness will come after trouble; at least, I wish it so, also, for you yourself can imagine in what need I find myself, I and all my family. . . . I have no work, because I have not the courage to ask it of anyone. My mother has not earned even enough to pay for the gold thread with the little cross which you know I love. Necessity made me sell it.

"I received your last letter of the 20th August from Spa with another letter for S. E. the Procurator Morosini. You directed me to take it to him myself, and on Sunday the last day of August, I did not fail to go there exactly at three o'clock. At once on my arrival, I spoke to a servant who admitted me without delay; but, my dear friend, I regret having to send you an unpleasant message. As soon as I handed him the letter, and before he even opened it, he said to me, 'I always know Casanova's affairs which trouble me.' After having read hardly more than a page, he said: 'I know not what to do!' I told him that, on the 6th of this month, I was to write you at Paris and that, if he would do me the honor of giving me his reply, I would put it in my letter. Imagine what answer he gave me! I was much surprised! He told me that I should wish you happiness but that he would not write to you again. He said no more. I kissed his hands and left. He did not give me even a sou. That is all he said to me. . . .

"S. E. Pietro Zaguri sent to me to ask if I knew where you were, because he had written two letters to Spa and had received no reply. . . .

II

Paris

On the night of the 18th or 19th September 1783, Casanova arrived at Paris.

On the 30th he wrote Francesca that he had been well received by his sister-in-law and by his brother, Francesco Casanova, the painter. Nearly all his friends had departed for the other world, and he would now have to make new ones, which would be difficult as he was no longer pleasing to the women.

On the 14th October he wrote again, saying that he was in good health and that Paris was a paradise which made him feel twenty years old. Four letters followed; in the first, dated from Paris on S. Martin's Day, he told Francesco not to reply for he did not know whether he would prolong his visit nor where he might go. Finding no fortune in Paris, he said he would go and search elsewhere. On the 23rd, he sent one hundred and fifty lires; "a true blessing," to the poor girl who was always short of money.

Between times, Casanova passed eight days at Fontainebleau, where he met "a charming young man of twenty-five," the son of "the young and lovely O'Morphi" who indirectly owed to him her position, in 1752, as the mistress of Louis XV. "I wrote my name on his tablets and begged him to present my compliments to his mother."

He also met, in the same place, his own son by Mme. Dubois, his former housekeeper at Soleure who had married the good M. Lebel. "We shall hear of the young gentleman in twenty-one years at Fontainebleau."

"When I paid my third visit to Paris, with the intention of ending my days in that capital, I reckoned on the friendship of M. d'Alembert, but he died, like, Fontenelle, a fortnight after my arrival, toward the end of 1783."

It is interesting to know that, at this time, Casanova met his famous contemporary, Benjamin Franklin. "A few days after the death of the illustrious d'Alembert," Casanova assisted, at the old Louvre, in a session of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. "Seated beside the learned Franklin, I was a little surprised to hear Condorcet ask him if he believed that one could give various directions to an air balloon. This was the response: 'The matter is still in its infancy, so we must wait.' I was surprised. It is not believable that the great philosopher could ignore the fact that it would be impossible to give the machine any other direction than that governed by the air which fills it, but these people nil tam verentur, quam ne dubitare aliqua de re videantur."

On the 13th November, Casanova left Paris in company with his brother, Francesco, whose wife did not accompany him. "His new wife drove him away from Paris."

"Now [1797 or 1798] I feel that I have seen Paris and France for the last time. That popular effervescence [the French Revolution] has disgusted me and I am too old to hope to see the end of it."

VIENNA

On the 29th November, Casanova wrote from Frankfort that a drunken postillon had upset him and in the fall he had dislocated his left shoulder, but that a good bone-setter had restored it to place. On the 1st December he wrote that he was healed, having taken medicine and having been blooded. He promised to send Francesca eight sequins to pay her rent. He reached Vienna about the 7th of December and on the 15th sent Francesca a bill of exchange for eight sequins and two lires.

On the last day of 1783, Francesca wrote to him at Vienna:

> "I see by your good letter that you will go to Dresden and then to Berlin and that you will return to Vienna the 10th January. . . . I am astonished, my dear friend, at the great journeys you make in this cold weather, but, still, you are a great man, big-hearted, full of spirit and courage; you travel in this terrible cold as though it were nothing. . . ."

On the 9th January, Casanova wrote from Dessau to his brother Giovanni, proposing to make peace with him, but without results. On the 27th, he was at Prague. By the 16th February, he was again in Vienna, after a trip lasting sixty-two days. His health was perfect, and he had gained flesh due, as he wrote Francesca, to his contented mind which was no longer tormented.

In February, he entered the service of M. Foscarini, Venetian Ambassador, "to write dispatches."

On the 10th March, Francesca wrote:

"Dearest of Friends, I reply at once to your good letter of the 28th February which I received Sunday. . . . I thank you for your kindness which makes you say that you love me and that when you have money you will send me some . . . but that at the moment you are dry as a salamander. I do not know what sort of animal that is. But as for me I am certainly dry of money and I am consumed with the hope of having some. . . . I see that you were amused at the Carnival and that you were four times at the masked ball, where there were two hundred women, and that you danced minuets and quadrilles to the great astonishment of the ambassador Foscarini who told everyone that you were sixty years old, although in reality you have not yet reached your sixtieth year. You might well laugh at that and say that he must be blind to have such an idea.

"I see that you assisted, with your brother, at a grand dinner at the Ambassador's. . . .

"You say that you have read my letters to your brother and that he salutes me. Make him my best compliments and thank him. You ask me to advise you whether, if he should happen to return to Venice with you, he could lodge with you in your house. Tell him yes, because the chickens are always in the loft and make no dirt; and, as for the dogs, one watches to see that they do not make dirt. The furniture of the apartment is already in place; it lacks only a wardrobe and the little bed which you bought for your nephew and the mirror; as for the rest, everything is as you left it. . . ."

It is possible that, at the "grand dinner," Casanova was presented to Count Waldstein, without whose kindness to Casanova the Memoirs probably would never have been written. The Lord of Dux, Joseph Charles Emmanuel Waldstein-Wartenberg, Chamberlain to Her Imperial Majesty, descendant of the great Wallenstein, was the elder of the eleven children of Emmanuel Philibert, Count Waldstein, and Maria Theresa, Princess Liechtenstein. Very egotistic and willful in his youth, careless of his affairs, and an imprudent gambler, at thirty years of age he had not yet settled down. His mother was disconsolated that her son could not separate himself from occupations "so little suited to his spirit and his birth."

On the 13th March 1784, Count Lamberg wrote Casanova: "I know M. le C. de Waldstein through having heard him praised by judges worthy of appreciating the transcendent qualities of more than one kind peculiar to the Count. I congratulate you on having such a Mœcenas, and I congratulate him in his turn on having chosen such a man as yourself." Which last remark certainly foreshadows the library at Dux.

Later, on the 12th March, 1785, Zaguri wrote: "In two months at the latest, all will be settled. I am very happy." Referring further, it is conjectured, to Casanova's hopes of placing himself with the Count.

LETTERS FROM FRANCESCA

20th March 1784. "I see that you will print one of your books; you say that you will send me two hundred copies which I can sell at thirty sous each; that you will tell Zaguri and that he will advise those who wish copies to apply to me . . ."

This book was the Lettre historico-critique sur un *fait connu dépendant d'une cause peu connue, adressee au duc de * * , 1784.

3rd April 1784. "I see with pleasure that you have gone to amuse yourself in company with two ladies and that you have traveled five posts to see the Emperor [Joseph II]. . . . You say that your fortune consists of one sequin. . . . I hope that you obtained permission to print your book, that you will send me the two hundred copies, and that I may be able to sell them. . . ."

14th April 1784. "You say that a man without money is the image of death, that he is a very wretched animal. I learn with regret that I am unlikely to see you at the approaching Festival of the Ascension . . . that you hope to see me once more before dying. . . . You make me laugh, telling me that at Vienna a balloon was made which arose in the air with six persons and that it might be that you would go up also."

28th April 1784. "I see, to my lively regret, that you have been in bed with your usual ailment [hemorrhoids]. But I am pleased to know that you are better. You certainly should go to the baths. . . . I have been discouraged in seeing that you have not come to Venice because you have no money. . . . P. S. Just at this moment I have received a good letter, enclosing a bill of exchange, which I will go and have paid. . . ."

5th May 1784. "I went to the house of M. Francesco Manenti, at S. Polo di Campo, with my bill of exchange, and he gave me at once eighteen pieces of ten lires each. . . . I figure that you made fun of me saying seriously that you will go up in a balloon and that, if the wind is favorable, you will go in the air to Trieste and then from Trieste to Venice."

19th May 1784. "I see, to my great regret, that you are in poor health and still short of money. . . . You say that you need twenty sequins and that you have only twenty trari. . . . I hope that your book is printed. . . ."

29th May 1784. "I note with pleasure that you are going to take the baths; but I regret that this treatment enfeebles and depresses you. It reassures me that you do not fail in your appetite nor your sleep. . . . I hope I will not hear you say again that you are disgusted with everything, and no longer in love with life. . . . I see that for you, at this moment, fortune sleeps. . . . I am not surprised that everything is so dear in the city where you are, for at Venice also one pays dearly and everything is priced beyond reach."

Zaguri wrote Casanova the 11th May, that he had met Francesca in the Mongolfieri casino. And on the 2nd June Casanova, doubtless feeling his helplessness in the matter of money, and the insufficiency of his occasional remittances, and suspicious of Francesca's loyalty, wrote her a letter of renunciation. Then came her news of the sale of his books; and eighteen months passed before he wrote to her again.

On the 12th June 1784, Francesca replied: "I could not expect to convey to you, nor could you figure, the sorrow that tries me in seeing that you will not occupy yourself any more with me. . . . I hid from you that I had been with that woman who lived with us, with her companion, the cashier of the Académie des Mongolfieristes. Although I went to this Academy with prudence and dignity, I did not want to write you for fear you would scold me. That is the only reason, and hereafter you may be certain of my sincerity and frankness. . . . I beg you to forgive me this time, if I write you something I have never written for fear that you would be angry with me because I had not told you. Know then that four months ago, your books which were on the mezzanine were sold to a library for the sum of fifty lires, when we were in urgent need. It was my mother who did it. . . ."

26th June 1784. ". . . Mme. Zenobia [de Monti] has asked me if I would enjoy her company. Certain that you would consent I have allowed her to come and live with me. She has sympathy for me and has always loved me."

7th July 1784. "Your silence greatly disturbs me! To receive no more of your letters! By good post I have sent you three letters, with this one, and you have not replied to any of them. Certainly, you have reason for being offended at me, because I hid from you something which you learned from another. . . . But you might have seen, from my last letter, that I have written you all the truth about my fault and that I have asked your pardon for not writing it before. . . . Without you and your help, God knows what will become of us. . . . For the rent of your chamber Mme. Zenobia will give us eight lires a month and five lires for preparing her meals. But what can one do with thirteen lires! . . . I am afflicted and mortified. . . . Do not abandon me."

LAST DAYS AT VIENNA

In 1785, at Vienna, Casanova ran across Costa, his former secretary who, in 1761, had fled from him taking "diamonds, watches, snuffbox, linen, rich suits and a hundred louis." "In 1785, I found this runagate at Vienna. He was then Count Erdich's man, and when we come to that period, the reader shall hear what I did."

Casanova did not reach this period, in writing his Memoirs, but an account of this meeting is given by Da Ponte, who was present at it, in his Memoirs. Costa had met with many misfortunes, as he told Casanova, and had himself been defrauded. Casanova threatened to have him hanged, but according to Da Ponte, was dissuaded from this by counter accusations made by Costa.

Da Ponte's narration of the incident is brilliant and amusing, in spite of our feeling that it is maliciously exaggerated: "Strolling one morning in the Graben with Casanova, I suddenly saw him knit his brows, squawk, grind his teeth, twist himself, raise his hands skyward, and, snatching himself away from me, throw himself on a man whom I seemed to know, shouting with a very loud voice:—'Murderer, I have caught thee.' A crowd having gathered as a result of this strange act and yell, I approached them with some disgust; nevertheless, I caught Casanova's hand and almost by force I separated him from the fray. He then told me the story, with desperate motions and gestures, and said that his antagonist was Gioachino Costa, by whom he had been betrayed. This Gioachino Costa, although he had been forced to become a servant by his vices and bad practices, and was at that very time servant to a Viennese gentleman, was more or less of a poet. He was, in fact, one of those who had honored me with their satire, when the Emperor Joseph selected me as poet of his theater. Costa entered a cafe, and while I continued to walk with Casanova, wrote and send him by a messenger, the following verses:

'Casanova, make no outcry;
You stole, indeed, as well as I;
You were the one who first taught me;
Your art I mastered thoroughly.
Silence your wisest course will be.'

"These verses had the desired effect. After a brief silence, Casanova laughed and then said softly in my ear:—'The rogue is right.' He went into the cafe and motioned to Costa to come out; they began to walk together calmly, as if nothing had happened, and they parted shaking hands repeatedly and seemingly calm and friendly. Casanova returned to me with a cameo on his little finger, which by a strange coincidence, represented Mercury, the god-protector of thieves. This was his greatest valuable, and it was all that was left of the immense booty, but represented the character of the two restored friends, perfectly."

Da Ponte precedes this account with a libellous narrative of Casanova's relations with the Marquise d'Urfé, even stating that Casanova stole from her the jewels stolen in turn by Costa, but, as M. Maynial remarks, we may attribute this perverted account "solely to the rancour and antipathy of the narrator." It is more likely that Casanova frightened Costa almost out of his wits, was grimly amused at his misfortunes, and let him go, since there was no remedy to Casanova's benefit, for his former rascality. Casanova's own brief, anticipatory account is given in his Memoirs.

In 1797, correcting and revising his Memoirs, Casanova wrote: "Twelve years ago, if it had not been for my guardian angel, I would have foolishly married, at Vienna, a young, thoughtless girl, with whom I had fallen in love." In which connection, his remark is interesting: "I have loved women even to madness, but I have always loved liberty better; and whenever I have been in danger of losing it, fate has come to my rescue."

While an identification of the "young, thoughtless girl" has been impossible, M. Rava believes her to be "C. M.," the subject of a poem found at Dux, written in duplicate, in Italian and French, and headed "Giacomo Casanova, in love, to C. M."

"When, Catton, to your sight is shown the love
Which all my tenderest caresses prove,
Feeling all pleasure's sharpest joys and fears,
Burning one moment, shivering the next,
Caressing you while showering you with tears,
Giving each charm a thousand eager kisses,
Wishing to touch at once a thousand blisses
And, at the ones beyond my power, vexed,
Abandoned in a furious desire,
Leaving these charms for other charms that fire,
Possessing all and yet desiring
Until, destroyed by excesses of pleasure,
Finding no words of love nor anything
To express my fires overflowing measure
Than deepening sighs and obscure murmuring:
Ah! Then you think to read my inmost heart
To find the love that can these signs impart
. . . Be not deceived. These transports, amorous cries,
These kisses, tears, desires and heavy sighs,
Of all the fire which devours me
Could less than even the lightest tokens be."

Evidently this same girl is the authoress of the two following letters written by "Caton M. . . ." to Casanova in 1786.

12th April 1786.

"You will infinitely oblige me if you will tell me to whom you wrote such pretty things about me; apparently it is the Abbé Da Ponte; but I would go to his house and, either he would prove that you had written it or I would have the honor of telling him that he is the most infamous traducer in the world. I think that the lovely picture which you make of my future has not as much excuse as you may think, and, in spite of your science, you deceive yourself. . . . But just now I will inform you of all my wooers and you can judge for yourself by this whether I deserve all the reproaches you made me in your last letter. It is two years since I came to know the Count de K. . . .; I could have loved him but I was too honest to be willing to satisfy his desires. . . . Some months afterward, I came to know the Count de M. . . .; he was not so handsome as K. . . . but he possessed every possible art for seducing a girl; I did everything for him, but I never loved him as much as his friend. In fine, to tell you all my giddinesses in a few words, I set everything right again with K. . . . and got myself into a quarrel with M. . . ., then I left K. . . . and returned to M. . . ., but at the house of the latter there was always an officer who pleased me more than both the two others and who sometimes conducted me to the house; then we found ourselves at the house of a friend, and it is of this same officer that I am ill. So, my dear friend, that is all. I do not seek to justify my past conduct; on the contrary, I know well that I have acted badly. . . . I am much afflicted at being the cause of your remaining away from Venice during the Carnival. . . . I hope to see you soon again and am, with much love,

Monsieur, your sincere

"I have spoken with the Abbé Da Ponte. He invited me to come to his house because, he said, he had something to tell me for you. I went there, but was received so coldly that I am resolved not to go there again. Also, Mlle. Nanette affected an air of reserve and took it on herself to read me lessons on what she was pleased to call my libertinism. . . . I beg that you will write nothing more about me to these two very dangerous personages. . . . Just now I will tell you of a little trick which I played on you, which without doubt deserves some punishment. The young, little Kasper, whom you formerly loved, came to ask me for the address of her dear Monsieur de Casanova, so that she could write a very tender letter full of recollections. I had too much politeness to wish to refuse a pretty girl, who was once the favorite of my lover, so just a request, so I gave her the address she wished; but I addressed the letter to a city far from you. Is it not, my dear friend, that you would like well to know the name of the city, so that you could secure the letter by post? But you can depend on my word that you will not know it until you have written me a very long letter begging me very humbly to indicate the place where the divine letter of the adorable object of your vows has gone. You might well make this sacrifice for a girl in whom the Emperor [Joseph II] interests himself, for it is known that, since your departure from Vienna, it is he who is teaching her French and music; and apparently he takes the trouble of instructing her himself, for she often goes to his house to thank him for his kindnesses to her, but I know not in what way she expresses herself.

"Farewell, my dear friend. Think sometimes of me and believe that I am your sincere friend,

C. M."

On the 23rd April 1785, the ambassador Foscarini died, depriving Casanova of a protector, probably leaving him without much money, and not in the best of health. He applied for the position of secretary to Count Fabris, his former friend, whose name had been changed from Tognolo, but without success. Casanova then determined to go to Berlin in the hope of a place in the Academy. On the 30th July he arrived at Bruen in Moravia, where his friend Maximilian-Joseph, Count Lamberg gave him, among other letters of recommendation, a letter addressed to Jean-Ferdinand Opiz, Inspector of Finances and Banks at Czaslau, in which he wrote:

"A celebrated man, M. Casanova, will deliver to you, my dear friend, the visiting card with which he is charged for Mme. Opiz and yourself. Knowing this amiable and remarkable man, will mark an epoch in your life, be polite and friendly to him, quod ipsi facies in mei memoriam faciatis. Keep yourself well, write to me, and if you can direct him to some honest man at Carlsbad, fail not to do so. . . ."

On the 15th August 1785, M. Opiz wrote Count Lamberg about Casanova's visit:

"Your letter of the 30th, including your cards for my wife and myself, was delivered the first of this month by M. Casanova. He was very anxious to meet the Princess Lubomirski again at Carlsbad. But as something about his carriage was broken, he was obliged to stop in Czaslau for two hours which he passed in my company. He has left Czaslau with the promise of giving me a day on his return. I am already delighted. Even in the short space of time in which I enjoyed his company, I found in him a man worthy of our highest consideration and of our love, a benevolent philosopher whose homeland is the great expanse of our planet (and not Venice alone) and who values only the men in the kings. . . . I know absolutely no one at Carlsbad, so I sincerely regret being unable to recommend him to anyone there, according to your desire. He did not wish, on account of his haste, to pause even at Prague and, consequently, to deliver, at this time, your letter to Prince Furstemberg."

I. Travels in 1783.

Casanova left Venice in January 1783, and went to Vienna.

On the 16th April Elisabeth Catrolli wrote to him at Vienna:

"Dearest of friends,

"Your letter has given me great pleasure. Be assured, I infinitely regret your departure. I have but two sincere friends, yourself and Camerani. I do not hope for more. I could be happy if I could have at least one of you near me to whom I could confide my cruel anxieties.

"Today, I received from Camerani a letter informing me that, in a former one, he had sent me a bill of exchange: I did not receive it, and I fear it has been lost.

"Dear friend, when you reach Paris, clasp him to your heart for me. In regard to Chechina (Francesca Buschini) I would say that I have not seen her since the day I took her your letter. Her mother is the ruin of that poor girl: let that suffice; I will say no more. . ."

After leaving Venice, Casanova apparently took an opportunity to pay his last disrespects to the Tribunal. At least, in May 1783, M. Schlick, French Secretary at Venice, wrote to Count Vergennes: "Last week there reached the State Inquisitors an anonymous letter stating that, on the 25th of this month, an earthquake, more terrible than that of Messina, would raze Venice to the ground. This letter has caused a panic here. Many patricians have left the capital and others will follow their example. The author of the anonymous letter. . . is a certain Casanova, who wrote from Vienna and found means to slip it into the Ambassador's own mails."

In about four months, Casanova was again on the way to Italy. He paused for a week at Udine and arrived at Venice on the 16th June. Without leaving his barge, he paused at his house just long enough to salute Francesca. He left Mestre on Tuesday the 24th June and on the same day dined at the house of F. Zanuzzi at Bassano. On the 25th he left Bassano by post and arrived in the evening at Borgo di Valsugano.

On the 29th, he wrote to Francesca from Augsbourg. He had stopped at Innsbruck to attend the theater and was in perfect health. He had reached Frankfort in forty-eight hours, traveling eighteen posts without stopping.

From Aix-la-Chapelle, on the 16th July, he wrote Francesca that he had met, in that city, Cattina, the wife of Pocchini (X, 3, 12, etc.). Pocchini was sick and in deep misery. Casanova, recalling all the abominable tricks this rogue had played on him refused Cattina the assistance she begged for in tears, laughed in her face, and said: "Farewell, I wish you a pleasant death."

At Mayence, Casanova embarked on the Rhine in company with the Marquis Durazzo, former Austrian Ambassador at Venice. The voyage was excellent and in two days he arrived at Cologne, in rugged health, sleeping well and eating like a wolf.

On the 30th July he wrote to Francesca from Spa and in this letter enclosed a gold coin. Everything was dear at Spa; his room cost eight lires a day with everything else in proportion.

On the 6th September he wrote from Antwerp to one of his good friends, the Abbé Eusebio della Lena, telling him that at Spa an English woman who had a passion for speaking Latin wished to submit him to trials which he judged it unnecessary to state precisely. He refused all her proposals, saying however that he would not reveal them to anyone; but that he did not feel he should refuse also "an order on her banker for twenty-five guineas."

On the 9th he wrote to Francesca from Brussels, and on the 12th he sent her a bill of exchange on the banker Corrado for one hundred and fifty lires. He said he had been intoxicated "because his reputation had required it." "This greatly astonishes me", Francesca responded, "for I have never seen you intoxicated nor even illuminated. . . I am very happy that the wine drove away the inflammation in your teeth."

Practically all information of Casanova's movements in 1783 and 1784 is obtained from Francesca's letters which were in the library at Dux.

In her letters of the 27th June and 11th July, Francesca wrote Casanova that she had directed the jew Abraham to sell Casanova's satin habit and velvet breeches, but could not hope for more than fifty lires because they were patched. Abraham had observed that at one time the habit had been placed in pledge with him by Casanova for three sequins.

On the 6th September, she wrote:

"With great pleasure, I reply to the three dear letters which you wrote me from Spa: the first of the 6th August, from which I learned that your departure had been delayed for some days to wait for someone who was to arrive in that city. I was happy that your appetite had returned, because good cheer is your greatest pleasure. . .

"In your second letter which you wrote me from Spa on the 16th August, I noted with sorrow that your affairs were not going as you wished. But console yourself, dear friend, for happiness will come after trouble; at least, I wish it so, also, for you yourself can imagine in what need I find myself, I and all my family. . . I have no work, because I have not the courage to ask it of anyone. My mother has not earned even enough to pay for the gold thread with the little red cross which you know I love. Necessity made me sell it.

"I received your last letter of the 20th August from Spa with another letter for S. E. the Procurator Morosini. You directed me to take it to him myself, and on Sunday the last day of August, I did not fail to go there exactly at three o'clock. At once on my arrival, I spoke to a servant who admitted me without delay; but, my dear friend, I regret having to send you an unpleasant message. As soon as I handed him the letter, and before he even opened it, he said to me, "I always know Casanova's affairs which trouble me." After having read hardly more than a page, he said: "I know not what to do!" I told him that, on the 6th of this month, I was to write you at Paris and that, if he would do me the honor of giving me his reply, I would put it in my letter. Imagine what answer he gave me! I was much surprised! He told me that I should wish you happiness but that he would not write to you again. He said no more. I kissed his hands and left. He did not give me even a sou. That is all he said to me. . .

"S. E. Pietro Zaguri sent to me to ask if I knew where you were, because he had written two letters to Spa and had received no reply. . ."

II. Paris.

On the night of the 18th or 19th September 1783, Casanova arrived at Paris.

On the 30th he wrote Francesca that he had been well received by his sister-in-law and by his brother, Francesco Casanova, the painter. Nearly all his friends had departed for the other world, and he would now have to make new ones, which would be difficult as he was no longer pleasing to the women.

On the 14th October he wrote again, saying that he was in good health and that Paris was a paradise which made him feel twenty years old. Four letters followed; in the first, dated from Paris on S. Martin's Day, he told Francesca not to reply for he did not know whether he would prolong his visit nor where he might go. Finding no fortune in Paris, he said he would go and search elsewhere. On the 23d, he sent one hundred and fifty lires; "a true blessing," to the poor girl who was always short of money.

Between times, Casanova passed eight days at Fontainebleau, where he met "a charming young man of twenty-five", the son of "the young and lovely O'Morphi" who indirectly owed to him her position, in 1752, as the mistress of Louis XV. "I wrote my name on his tablets and begged him to present my compliments to his mother." (III, 9).

He also met, in the same place, his own son by Mme. Dubois, his former housekeeper at Soleure (VI, 5, etc.) who had married the good M. Lebel. "We shall hear of the young gentleman in twenty-one years at Fontainebleau." (VIII, 4).

"When I paid my third visit to Paris, with the intention of ending my days in that capital, I reckoned on the friendship of M. d'Alembert, but he died, like Fontenelle, a fortnight after my arrival, toward the end of 1783." (III, 8).

It is interesting to know that, at this time,

Casanova met his famous contemporary, Benjamin Franklin. "A few days after the death of the illustrious d'Alembert", Casanova assisted, at the old Louvre, in a session of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. "Seated beside the learned Franklin, I was a little surprised to hear Condorcet ask him if he believed that one could give various directions to an air balloon. This was the response: 'The matter is still in its infancy, so we must wait.' I was surprised. It is not believable that the great philosopher could ignore the fact that it would be impossible to give the machine any other direction than that governed by the air which fills it, but these people nil tam verentur, quam ne dubitare aliqua de re videantur."

On the 13th November, Casanova left Paris in company with his brother, Francesco, whose wife did not accompany him. "His new wife drove him away from Paris". (IX, 6).

"Now (1797 or 1798) I feel that I have seen Paris and France for the last time. That popular effervescence (the French Revolution) has disgusted me and I am too old to hope to see the end of it." (III, 8).

III. Vienna.

On the 29th November, Casanova wrote from Frankfort that a drunken postillon had upset him and in the fall he had dislocated his left shoulder, but that a good bone-setter had restored it to place. On the 1st December he wrote that he was healed, having taken medicine and having been blooded. He promised to send Francesca eight sequins to pay her rent. He reached Vienna about the 7th of December and on the 15th sent Francesca a bill of exchange for eight sequins and two lires.

On the last day of 1783, Francesca wrote to him at Vienna.

"I see by your good letter that you will go to Dresden and then to Berlin and that you will return to Vienna the 10th January. . . I am astonished, my dear friend, at the great journeys you make in this cold weather, but, still, you are a great man, big-hearted, full of spirit and courage; you travel in this terrible cold as though it were nothing. . ."

On the 9th January, Casanova wrote from

Dessan to his brother Giovanni, proposing to make peace with him, but without results. On the 27th, he was at Prague. By the 16th February, he was again in Vienna, after a trip lasting sixty-two days. His health was perfect, and he had gained flesh due, as he wrote Francesca, to his contented mind which was no longer tormented.

In February, he entered the service of M. Foscarini, Venetian Ambassador, "to write dispatches."

On the 10th March, Francesca wrote:

"Dearest of Friends, I reply at once to your good letter of the 28th February which I received Sunday. . . I thank you for your kindness which makes you say that you love me and that when you have money you will send me some. . . but that at the moment you are dry as a salamander. I do not know what sort of animal that is. But as for me I am certainly dry of money and I am consumed with the hope of having some. . . I see that you were amused at the Carnival and that you were four times at the masked ball, where there were two hundred women, and that you danced minuets and quadrilles to the great astonishment of the ambassador Foscarini who told everyone that you were sixty years old, although in reality you have not yet reached your sixtieth year. You might well laugh at that and say that he must be blind to have such an idea.

"I see that you assisted, with your brother, at a grand dinner at the Ambassador's. . .

"You say that you have read my letters to your brother and that he salutes me. Make him my best compliments and thank him. You ask me to advise you whether, if he should happen to return to Venice with you, he could lodge with you in your house. Tell him yes, because the chickens are always in the loft and make no dirt; and, as for the dogs, one watches to see that they do not make dirt. The furniture of the apartment is already in place; it lacks only a wardrobe and the little bed which you bought for your nephew and the mirror; as for the rest, everything is as you left it. . ."

It is possible that, at the "grand dinner", Casanova was presented to Count Waldstein, without whose kindness to Casanova the Memoirs probably would never have been written. The Lord of Dux, Joseph Charles Emmanuel Waldstein-Wart-enberg, Chamberlain to Her Imperial Majesty, descendant of the great Wallenstein, was the elder of the eleven children of Emmanuel Philibert, Count Waldstein, and Maria Theresa, Princess Liechtenstein. Very egotistic and wilful in his youth, careless of his affairs, and an imprudent gambler, at thirty years of age he had not yet settled down. His mother was desolated that her son could not separate himself from occupations "so little suited to his spirit and his birth."

On the 13th March 1773, Count Lamberg wrote Casanova: "I know M. le C. de Waldstein through having heard him praised by judges worthy of appreciating the transcendent qualities of more than one kind particular to the Count. I congratulate you on having such a Mecaenas, and I congratulate him in his turn on having chosen such a man as yourself." Which last remark certainly forshadows the library at Dux.

Later, on the 12th March 1785, Zaguri wrote: "In two months at the latest, all will be settled. I am very happy." Referring further, it is conjectured, to Casanova's hopes of placing himself with the Count.

IV. Letters From Francesca

20th March 1784. "I see that you will print one of your books; you say that you will send me two hundred copies which I can sell at thirty sous each; that you will tell Zaguri and that he will advise those who wish copies to apply to me . . ."

This book was the Lettre historico-critique sur un fait connu dépendant d'une cause peu connue adressee au duc de , 1784.

3d April 1784. "I see with pleasure that you have gone to amuse yourself in company with two ladies and that you have traveled five posts to see the Emperor (Joseph II) . . You say that your fortune consists of one sequin . . . I hope that you obtained permission to print your book, that you will send me the two hundred copies, and that I may be able to sell them . . ."

14th April 1784. "You say that a man without money is the image of death, that he is a very wretched animal. I learn with regret that I am unlikely to see you at the approaching Festival of the Ascension. . . that you hope to see me once more before dying. . . You make me laugh, telling me that at Vienna a balloon was made which arose in the air with six persons and that it might be that you would go up also."

28th April 1784. "I see, to my lively regret, that you have been in bed with your usual ailment (hemorrhoids). But I am pleased to know that you are better. You certainly should go to the baths. . . I have been discouraged in seeing that you have not come to Venice because you have no money. . . P. S. Just at this moment I have received a good letter, enclosing a bill of exchange, which I will go and have paid. . ."

5th May 1784. "I went to the house of M. Francesco Manenti, at S. Polo di Campo, with my bill of exchange, and he gave me at once eighteen pieces of ten lires each. . . I figure that you made fun of me saying seriously that you will go up in a balloon and that, if the wind is favorable, you will go in the air to Trieste and then from Trieste to Venice."

19th May, 1784. "I see, to my great regret, that you are in poor health and still short of money. . . You say that you need twenty sequins and that you have only twenty trari. . . I hope that your book is printed. . ."

29th May, 1784. "I note with pleasure that you are going to take the baths; but I regret that this treatment enfeebles and depresses you. It reassures me that you do not fail in your appetite nor your sleep. . . I hope I will not hear you say again that you are disgusted with everything, and no longer in love with life. . . I see that for you, at this moment, fortune sleeps. . . I am not surprised that everything is so dear in the city where you are, for at Venice also one pays dearly and everything is priced beyond reach."

Zaguri wrote Casanova the 11th May, that he had met Francesca in the Mongolfieri casino. And on the 2d June Casanova, doubtless feeling his helplessness in the matter of money, and the insufficiency of his occasional remittances, and suspicious of Francesca's loyalty, wrote her a letter of renunciation. Then came her news of the sale of his books; and eighteen months passed before he wrote to her again.

On the 12th June 1784, Francesca replied. "I could not expect to convey to you, nor could you figure, the sorrow that tries me in seeing that you will not occupy yourself any more with me. . . I hid from you that I had been with that woman who lived with us, with her companion, the cashier of the Academie des Mongolfieristes. Although I went to this Academy with prudence and dignity, I did not want to write you for fear you would scold me. That is the only reason, and hereafter you may be certain of my sincerity and frankness. . . I beg you to forgive me this time, if I write you something I have never written for fear that you would be angry with me because I had not told you. Know then that four months ago, your books which were on the mezzanine were sold to a library for the sum of fifty lires, when we were in urgent need. It was my mother who did it. . ."

26th June 1784. ". . . Mme. Zenobia (de Monti) has asked me if I would enjoy her company. Certain that you would consent I have allowed her to come and live with me. She has sympathy for me and has always loved me."

7 July 1784. "Your silence greatly disturbs me! To receive no more of your letters! By good post I have sent you three letters, with this one, and you have not replied to any of them. Certainly, you have reason for being offended at me, because I hid from you something which you learned from another. . . But you might have seen, from my last letter, that I have written you all the truth about my fault and that I have asked your pardon for not writing it before. . . Without you and your help, God knows what will become of us. . . For the rent of your chamber Mme. Zenobia will give us eight lires a month and five lires for preparing her meals. But what can one do with thirteen lires! . . . I am afflicted and mortified. . . Do not abandon me."

V. Last Days at Vienna.

In 1785, at Vienna, Casanova ran across Costa, his former secretary who, in 1761, had fled from him taking "diamonds, watches, snuffbox, linen, rich suits and a hundred louis." (VIII, 1). "In 1785, I found this rungate at Vienna. He was then Count Erdich's man, and when we come to that period, the reader shall hear what I did." (XII, 5).

Casanova did not reach this period, in writing his Memoirs, but an account of this meeting is given by Da Ponte, who was present at it, in his own Memoirs. Costa had met with many misfortunes, as he told Casanova, and had himself been defrauded. Casanova threatened to have him hanged, but according to Da Ponte, was dissuaded from this by counter accusations made by Costa.

Da Ponte's narration of the incident is brilliant and amusing, in spite of our feeling that it is maliciously exaggerated: "Strolling one morning in the Graben with Casanova, I suddenly saw him knit his brows, squawk, grind his teeth, twist himself, raise his hands skyward, and, snatching himself away from me, throw himself on a man whom I seemed to know, shouting with a very loud voice:— 'Murderer, I have caught thee.' A crowd having gathered as a result of this strange act and yell, I approached them with some disgust; nevertheless, I caught Casanova's hand and almost by force I separated him from the fray. He then told me the story, with desperate motions and gestures, and said that his antagonist was Gioachino Costa, by whom he had been betrayed. This Gioachino Costa, although he had been forced to become a servant by his vices and bad practices, and was at that very time servant to a Viennese gentleman, was more or less of a poet. He was, in fact, one of those who had honored me with their satire, when the Emperor Joseph selected me as poet of his theater. Costa entered a cafe, and while I continued to walk with Casanova, wrote and sent him by a Messenger, the following verses:

'Casanova, make no outcry;
You stole, indeed, as well as I;
You were the one who first taught me;
Your art I mastered thoroughly.
Silence your wisest course will be.'

"These verses had the desired effect. After a brief silence, Casanova laughed and then said softly in my ear:— 'The rogue is right.' He went into the cafe and motioned to Costa to come out; they began to walk together calmly, as if nothing had happened, and they parted shaking hands repeatedly and seemingly calm and friendly. Casanova returned to me with a cameo on his little finger, which by a strange coincidence, represented Mercury, the god-protector of thieves. This was his greatest valuable, and it was all that was left of the immense booty, but represented the character of the two restored friends, perfectly."

Da Ponte precedes this account with a libellous narrative of Casanova's relations with the Marquise d'Urfé, even stating that Casanova stole from her the jewels stolen in turn by Costa, but, as M. Maynial remarks, we may attribute this perverted account "solely to the rancour and antipathy of the narrator." It is more likely that Casanova frightened Costa almost out of his wits, was grimly amused at his misfortunes, and let him go, since there was no remedy to Casanova's benefit, for his former rascality. Casanova's own brief, anticipatory account is given in Volume VII, (VII, 11).

In 1797, correcting and revising his Memoirs, Casanova wrote. "Twelve years ago, if it had not been for my guardian angel, I would have foolishly married, at Vienna, a young, thoughtless girl, with whom I had fallen in love." (I, 3). In which connection, his remark (III, 8) is interesting: "I have loved women even to madness, but I have always loved liberty better; and whenever I have been in danger of losing it, fate has come to my rescue."

While an identification of the "young, thoughtless girl" has been impossible, M. Rava believes her to be "C. M.", the subject of a poem found at Dux, written in duplicate, in Italian and French, and headed "Giacomo Casanova, in love, to "C. M."

"When, Catton, to your sight is shown the love
Which all my tenderest carresses prove,
Feeling all pleasure's sharpest joys and fears,
Burning one moment, shivering the next,
Caressing you while showering you with tears,

Giving each charm a thousand eager kisses,
Wishing to touch at once a thousand blisses
And, at the ones beyond my power, vexed,
Abandoned in a furious desire,
Leaving these charms for other charms that fire,
Possessing all and yet desiring
Until, destroyed by excesses of pleasure,
Finding no words of love nor anything
To express my fires overflowing measure
Than deepening sighs and obscure murmuring:
Ah! Then you think to read my inmost heart
To find the love that can these signs impart
. . . Be not deceived. These transports, amorous cries,
These kisses, tears, desires and heavy sighs,
Of all the fire which devours me
Could less than even the lightest tokens be."

Evidently this same girl is the author of of two following letters written by "Caton M . . ." to Casanova in 1786.

"You will infinitely oblige me if you will tell me to whom you wrote such pretty things about me; apparently it is the Abbé Da Ponte; but I would go to his house and, either he would prove that you had written it or I would have the honor of telling him that he is the most infamous traducer in the world. I think that the lovely picture which you make of my future has not as much excuse as you may think, and, in spite of your science, you deceive yourself. . . But just now I will inform you of all my wooers and you can judge for yourself by this whether I deserve all the reproaches you made me in your last letter. It is two years since I came to know the Count de K . . .; I could have loved him but I was too honest to be willing to satisfy his desires. . . Some months afterward, I came to know the Count de M . . . ; he was not so handsome as K . . . but he possessed every possible art for seducing a girl; I did everything for him, but I never loved him as much as his friend. In fine, to tell you all my giddinesses in a few words, I set everything right again with K . . . and got myself into a quarrel with M . . . , then I left K . . . and returned to M . . . , but at the house of the latter there was always an officer who pleased me more than both the two others and who sometimes conducted me to the house; then we found ourselves at the house of a friend, and it is of this same officer that I am ill. So, my dear friend, that is all. I do not seek to justify my past conduct; on the contrary, I know well that I have acted badly. . . I am much afflicted at being the cause of your remaining away from Venice during the Carnival . . I hope to see you soon again and am, with much love,

Monsieur, your sincere

"I have spoken with the Abbé Da Ponte. He invited me to come to his house because, he said, he had something to tell me for you. I went there, but was received so coldly that I am resolved not to go there again. Also, Mlle. Nanette affected an air of reserve and took it on herself to read me lessons on what she was pleased to call my libertinism . . I beg that you will write nothing more about me to these two very dangerous personages . . Just now I will tell you of a little trick which I played on you, which without doubt deserves some punishment. The young, little Kasper, whom you formerly loved, came to ask me for the address of her dear Monsieur de Casanova, so that she could write a very tender letter full of recollections. I had too much politeness to wish to refuse a pretty girl, who was once the favorite of my lover, so just a request, so I gave her the address she wished; but I addressed the letter to a city far from you. Is it not, my dear friend, that you would like well to know the name of the city, so that you could secure the letter by post? But you can depend on my word that you will not know it until you have written me a very long letter begging me very humbly to indicate the place where the divine letter of the adorable object of your vows has gone. You might well make this sacrifice for a girl in whom the Emperor (Joseph II) interests himself, for it is known that, since your departure from Vienna, it is he who is teaching her French and music; and apparently he takes the trouble of instructing her himself, for she often goes to his house to thank him for his kindnesses to her, but I know not in what way she expresses herself.

"Farewell, my dear friend. Think sometimes of me and believe that I am your sincere friend,

C. M."

On the 23d April 1785, the ambassador Foscarini died, depriving Casanova of a protector, probably leaving him without much money, and not in the best of health. He applied for the position of secretary to Count Fabris, his former friend whose name had been changed from Tognolo (II, 7), but without success. Casanova then determined to go to Berlin in the hope of a place in the Academy. On the 30th July, he arrived at Bruen in Moravia, where his friend Maximilian-Joseph, Count Lamberg gave him, among other letters of recommendation, a letter addressed to Jean-Ferdinand Opiz, Inspector of Finances and Banks at Czaslau, in which he wrote:

"A celebrated man, M. Casanova, will deliver to you, my dear friend, the visiting card with which he is charged for Mme. Opiz and yourself. Knowing this amiable and remarkable man, will mark an epoch in your life. Be polite and friendly to him, quod ipsi facies in mei memoriam faciatis. Keep yourself well, write to me, and if you can direct him to some honest man at Carlsbad, fail not to do so . . ."

On the 15th August 1785, M. Opiz wrote Count Lamberg about Casanova's visit:

"Your letter of the 30th, including your cards for my wife and myself, was delivered the first of this month by M. Casanova. He was very anxious to meet the Princess Lubomirski again at Carlsbad. But as something about his carriage was broken, he was obliged to stop in Czaslau for two hours which he passed in my company. He has left Czaslau with the promise of giving me a day on his return. I am already delighted. Even in the short space of time in which I enjoyed his company, I found in him a man worthy of our highest consideration and of our love, a benevolent philosopher whose home-land is the great expanse of our planet (and not Venice alone) and who values only the men in the kings. . . I know absolutely no one at Carlsbad, so I sincerely regret being unable to recommend him to anyone there, according to your desire. He did not wish, on account of his haste, to pause even at Prague and, consequently, to deliver, at this time, your letter to Prince Furstemberg."

PART THE THIRD

THE CASTLE AT DUX

It is uncertain how long Casanova remained at Carlsbad. While there, however, he met again the Polish nobleman Zawoiski, with whom he had gambled in Venice in 1746. "As to Zawoiski, I did not tell him the story until I met him in Carlsbad old and deaf, forty years later." He did not return to Czaslau, but in September 1785 he was at Teplitz where he found Count Waldstein whom he accompanied to his castle at Dux.

From this time onward he remained almost constantly at the castle where he was placed in charge of the Count's library and given a pension of one thousand florins annually.

Describing his visit to the castle in 1899, Arthur Symons writes: "I had the sensation of an enormous building: all Bohemian castles are big, but this one was like a royal palace. Set there in the midst of the town, after the Bohemian fashion, it opens at the back upon great gardens, as if it were in the midst of the country. I walked through room after room, corridor after corridor; everywhere there were pictures, everywhere portraits of Wallenstein, and battle scenes in which he led on his troops. The library, which was formed, or at least arranged, by Casanova, and which remains as he left it, contains some twenty-five thousand volumes, some of them of considerable value. . . . The library forms part of the Museum, which occupies a ground-floor wing of the castle. The first room is an armoury, in which all kinds of arms are arranged, in a decorative way, covering the ceiling and the walls with strange patterns. The second room contains pottery, collected by Casanova's Waldstein on his Eastern travels. The third room is full of curious mechanical toys, and cabinets, and carvings in ivory. Finally, we come to the library, contained in the two innermost rooms. The book shelves are painted white and reach to the low vaulted ceilings, which are whitewashed. At the end of a bookcase, in the corner of one of the windows, hangs a fine engraved portrait of Casanova."

In this elaborate setting, Casanova found the refuge he so sadly needed for his last years. The evil days of Venice and Vienna, and the problems and makeshifts of mere existence, were left behind. And for this refuge he paid the world with his Memoirs.

II

LETTERS FROM FRANCESCA

In 1786, Casanova renewed his correspondence with Francesca, who wrote:

1st July 1786.

"After a silence of a year and a half, I received from you yesterday a good letter which has consoled me in informing me that you are in perfect health. But, on the other hand, I was much pained to see that in your letter you did not call me Friend, but Madame. . . . You have reason to chide me and to reproach me for having rented a house without surety or means of paying the rent. As to the advice you give me that if some honest person would pay me my rent, or at least a part of it, I should have no scruples about taking it because a little more, or a little less, would be of little importance. . . . I declare to you that I have been disconsolated at receiving from you such a reproach which is absolutely unjustified. . . . You tell me that you have near you a young girl who merits all your solicitations and your love, she and her family of six persons who adore you and give you every attention; that she costs you all you have, so that you cannot send me even a sou. . . . I am pained to hear you say that you will never return to Venice, and yet I hope to see you again. . . ."

The "young girl" referred to in Francesca's letter was Anna-Dorothea Kleer, daughter of the porter of the castle. This young girl became pregnant in 1786 and Casanova was accused of seducing her. The guilty one, however, was a painter named Schottner who married the unfortunate girl in January 1787.

9th August 1786.

"My only true friend,

"It is two days since I received your dear letter; I was very happy to see you writing. . . . You have reason to mortify me and reproach me in recalling all the troubles I caused you, and especially that which you call treachery, the sale of your books, of which in part I was not guilty. . . . Forgive me, my dear friend, me and my foolish mother who, despite all my objections, absolutely insisted on selling them. Regarding that which you write me that you know that my mother, last year, told about that you had been my ruin, this may unhappily be true, since you already know the evil thoughts of my mother, who even says that you are still at Venice. . . . When have I not been always sincere with you, and when have I not at least listened to your good advices and offers? I am in a desperate situation, abandoned by all, almost in the streets, almost about to be homeless. . . . Where are all the pleasures which formerly you procured me? Where are the theatres, the comedies which we once saw together! . . ."

5th January 1787.

"The first of the year I received your dear letter with the bill of exchange for one hundred and twenty-five lires which you sent me so generously. . . . You say you have forgiven me for all the troubles I have caused you. Forget all, then, and do not accuse me any more of things which are but too true and of which the remembrance alone cuts me to the heart. . . . You write me that you have been forgotten by a person of whom you were very fond, that she is married and that you have not seen her for more than a month."

The "person" referred to was Anna Kleer.

5th October 1787.

. ."Until the other day, I had been waiting for your arrival, hoping that you would come to assist at the entry of the Procurator Memmo. . . . I see by your good letter that you were not able to get away, since your presence is nearly always necessary in the great castle. . . . I learn of the visit you have received from the Emperor who wished to see your library of forty-thousand volumes! . . . You say that you detest the chase and that you are unhappy when politeness obliges you to go. . . . I am pleased to know that you are in good health, that you are stout and that you have a good appetite and sleep well. . . . I hope that the printing of your book [Histoire de ma fuite] is going according to your wishes. If you go to Dresden for the marriage of your niece, enjoy yourself for me. . . . Forget not to write to me; this gives me such pleasure! Remember me. Full of confidence in your friendship, I am, and always will be, your true and sincere friend,

Francesca Buschini."

Correspondence and Activities

In 1787, a book was published under the title of Dreissig Brief uber Galizien by Traunpaur, which included this passage: "The most famous adventurers of two sorts (there are two, in fact: honest adventurers and adventurers of doubtful reputation) have appeared on the scene of the kingdom of Poland. The best known on the shores of the Vistula are: the miraculous Cagliostro: Boisson de Quency, grand charlatan, soldier of fortune, decorated with many orders, member of numerous Academies: the Venetian Casanova of Saint-Gall, a true savant, who fought a duel with Count Branicki: the Baron de Poellnitz . . . the lucky Count Tomatis, who knew so well how to correct fortune, and many others."

In June 1789, Casanova received a letter from Teresa Boisson de Quency, the wife of the adventurer above referred to:

"Much honored Monsieur Giacomo:

"For a long time I have felt a very particular desire to evidence to you the estimation due your spirit and your eminent qualities: the superb sonnet augmented my wish. But the inconveniences of childbirth and the cares required by a little girl whom I adore, made me defer this pleasure. During my husband's absence, your last and much honored letter came to my hands. Your amiable compliments to me, engage me to take the pen to give you renewed assurance that you have in me a sincere admirer of your great talent. . . . When I wish to point out a person who writes and thinks with excellence, I name Monsieur Casanova. . . ."

In 1793, Teresa de Quency wished to return to Venice at which time Zaguri wrote Casanova: "The Bassani has received letters from her husband which tell her nothing more than that he is alive."

Casanova passed the months of May, June and July 1788 at Prague, supervising the printing of the Histoire de ma fuite.

"I remember laughing very heartily at Prague, six years ago, on learning that some thin-skinned ladies, on reading my flight from The Leads, which was published at that date, took great offense at the above account, which they thought I should have done well to leave out."

In May he was troubled with an attack of the grippe. In October, he was in Dresden, apparently with his brother. Around this time "The Magdalene," a painting by Correggio, was stolen from the Museum of the Elector.

On the 30th October 1788, Casanova wrote to the Prince Belozelski, Russian Minister to the Court of Dresden: "Tuesday morning, after having embraced my dear brother, I got into a carriage to return here. At the barrier on the outskirts of Dresden, I was obliged to descend, and six men carried the two chests of my carriage, my two night-bags and my capelière into a little chamber on the ground level, demanded my keys, and examined everything. . . . The youngest of these in- famous executors of such an order told me they were searching for 'The Magdalene.' . . . The oldest had the impudence to put his hands on my waistcoat. . . . At last they let me go.

"This, my prince, delayed me so that I could not reach Petervalden by daylight. I stopped at an evil tavern where, dying of famine and rage, I ate everything I saw; and, wishing to drink and not liking beer, I gulped down some beverage which my host told me was good and which did not seem unpleasant. He told me that it was Pilnitz Moste. This beverage aroused a rebellion in my guts. I passed the night tormented by a continual diarrhœa. I arrived here the day before yesterday (the 28th), where I found an unpleasant duty awaiting me. Two months ago, I brought a woman here to cook, needing her while the Count is away; as soon as she arrived, I gave her a room and I went to Leipzig. On returning here, I found three servants in the hands of surgeons and all three blame my cook for putting them in such a state. The Count's courier had already told me, at Leipzig, that she had crippled him. Yesterday the Count arrived and would do nothing but laugh, but I have sent her back and exhorted her to imitate the Magdalene. The amusing part is that she is old, ugly and ill-smelling."

In 1789, 1791 and 1792, Casanova received three letters from Maddalena Allegranti, the niece of J. B. Allegranti the innkeeper with whom Casanova lodged at Florence in 1771. "This young person, still a child, was so pretty, so gracious, with such spirit and such charms, that she incessantly distracted me. Sometimes she would come into my chamber to wish me good-morning. . . . Her appearance, her grace, the sound of her voice . . .

were more than I could resist; and, fearing the seduction would excuse mine, I could find no other expedient than to take flight. . . . Some years later, Maddalena became a celebrated musician. . . ."

At this period of Casanova's life, we hear again of the hussy who so upset Casanova during his visit to London that he was actually on the point of committing suicide through sheer desperation. On the 20th September 1789, he wrote to the Princess Clari, sister of the Prince de Ligne: "I am struck by a woman at first sight, she completely ravishes me, and I am perhaps lost, for she may be a Charpillon."

There were, among the papers at Dux, two letters from Marianne Charpillon, and a manuscript outlining the story of Casanova's relations with her and her family, as detailed in the Memoirs. With the story in mind, the letters from this girl, "the mistress, now of one, now of another," are of interest:

"I know not, Monsieur, whether you forgot the engagement Saturday last; as for me, I remember that you consented to give us the pleasure of having you at dinner to-day, Monday, the 12th of the month. I would greatly like to know whether your ill-humor has left you; this would please me. Farewell, in awaiting the honor of seeing you.

Marianne de Charpillon."

"Monsieur,

"As I have a part in all which concerns you, I am greatly put out to know of the new illness which incommodes you; I hope that this will be so trifling that we will have the pleasure of seeing you well and at our house, to-day or to-morrow.

"And, in truth, the gift which you sent me is so pretty that I know not how to express to you the pleasure it has given me and how much I value it; and I cannot see why you must always provoke me by telling me that it is my fault that you are filled with bile, while I am as innocent as a new-born babe and would wish you so gentle and patient that your blood would become a true clarified syrup; this will come to you if you follow my advice. I am, Monsieur,

Your very humble servant,
[Marianne Charpillon]
Wednesday at six o'clock."

On the 8th April, 1790, Zaguri wrote in reference to vertigo of which Casanova complained: "Have you tried riding horseback? Do you not think that is an excellent preservative? I tried it this last summer and I find myself very well."

In 1790, Casanova had a conversation with the Emperor Joseph II at Luxemburg, on the subject of purchased nobility, which he reports in the Memoirs.

This same year, attending the coronation of Leopold at Prague, Casanova met his grandson (and, probably, as he himself believed, his own son), the son of Leonilda, who was the daughter of Casanova and Donna Lucrezia, and who was married to the Marquis C. . . . In 1792, Leonilda wrote, inviting Casanova to "spend the remainder of my days with her."

In February 1791, Casanova wrote to Countess Lamberg: "I have in my capitularies more than four hundred sentences which pass for aphorisms and which include all the tricks which place one word for another. One can read in Livy that Hannibal overcame the Alps by means of vinegar. No elephant ever uttered such a stupidity. Livy? Not at all. Livy was not a beast; it is you who are, foolish instructor of credulous youth! Livy did not say aceto which means vinegar, but aceta which means axe."

In April 1791, Casanova wrote to Carlo Grimani at Venice, stating that he felt he had committed a great fault in publishing his libel, Ne amori ne donne, and very humbly begging his pardon. Also that his Memoirs would be composed of six volumes in octavo with a seventh supplementary volume containing codicils.

In June, Casanova composed for the theater of Princess Clari, at Teplitz, a piece entitled: Le Polémoscope ou la Calomnie démasquée par la présence d'esprit, tragicomédie en trois actes. The manuscript was preserved at Dux, together with another form of the same, having the sub-title of La Lorgnette Menteuse ou la Calomnie démasquée. It may be assumed that the staging of this piece was an occasion of pleasant activity for Casanova.

In January 1792, during Count Waldstein's absence in London or Paris, Casanova was embroiled with M. Faulkircher, maitre d'hôtel, over the unpleasant matter indicated in two of Casanova's letters to this functionary:

"Your rascally Vidierol . . . tore my portrait out of one of my books, scrawled my name on it, with the epithet which you taught him and then stuck it on the door of the privy. . . .

"Determined to make sure of the punishment of your infamous valet, and wishing at the same time to give proof of my respect for Count Waldstein, not forgetting that, as a last resort, I have the right to invade his jurisdiction, I took an advocate, wrote my complaint and had it translated into German. . . . Having heard of this at Teplitz, and having known that I would not save your name, you came to my chamber to beg me to write whatever I wished but not to name you because it would place you wrong before the War Council and expose you to the loss of your pension. . . . I have torn up my first complaint and have written a second in Latin, which an advocate of Bilin has translated for me and which I have deposited at the office of the judiciary at Dux. . . ."

Following this matter, Casanova attended the Carnival at Oberleutensdorf, and left at Dux a manuscript headed Passe temps de Jacques Casanova de Seingalt pour le carnaval de l'an 1792 dans le bourg d'Oberleutensdorf. While in that city, meditating on the Faulkircher incident, he wrote also Les quinze pardons, monologue nocturne du bibliothécaire, also preserved in manuscript at Dux, in which we read:

"Gerron, having served twenty years as a simple soldier, acquired a great knowledge of military discipline. This man was not yet seventy years old. He had come to believe, partly from practice, partly from theory, that twenty blows with a bâton on the rump are not dishonoring. When the honest soldier was unfortunate enough to deserve them, he accepted them with resignation. The pain was sharp, but not lasting; it did not deprive him of either appetite nor honor. . . . Gerron, becoming a corporal, had obtained no idea of any kind of sorrow other than that coming from the blows of a bâton on the rump. . . . On this idea, he thought that the soul of an honest man was no different than a soldier's breech. If Gerron caused trouble to the spirit of a man of honor, he thought that this spirit, like his own, had only a rump, and that any trouble he caused would pass likewise. He deceived himself. The breech of the spirit of an honest man is different than the breech of the spirit of a Gerron who rendered compatible the rank of a military officer with the vile employments of a domestic and the stable-master of some particular lord. Since Gerron deceived himself, we must pardon him all his faults . . ." etc.

Casanova complained of the Faulkircher incident to the mother of Count Waldstein, who wrote: "I pity you, Monsieur, for being obliged to live among such people and in such evil company, but my son will not forget that which he owes to himself and I am sure he will give you all the satisfaction you wish." Also to his friend Zaguri, who wrote, the 16th March: "I hope that the gout in your hand will not torment you any more. . . . You have told me the story I asked about and which begins: 'Two months have passed since an officer, who is at Vienna, insulted me!' I cannot understand whether he who wrote you an insulting letter is at Vienna or whether he is at Dux. When will the Count return? . . . You should await his return because you would have, among other reasons to present to him, that of not wishing to have recourse to other jurisdiction than his. . . . You say your letters have been intercepted? Someone has put your portrait in the privy? The devil! It is a miracle that you have not killed someone. Positively, I am curious to know the results and I hope that you make no mistakes in this affair which appears to me very delicate."

In August 1792, or thereabouts, Da Ponte on his way to Dresden, visited Casanova at Dux, in the hope of collecting an old debt, but gave up this hope on realizing Casanova's limited resources. In the winter of 1792-3, Da Ponte found himself in great distress in Holland. "Casanova was the only man to whom I could apply," he writes in his Memoirs. "To better dispose him, I thought to write him in verse, depicting my troubles and begging him to send me some money on account of that which he still owed me. Far from considering my request, he contented himself with replying, in vulgar prose, by a laconic billet which I transcribe: 'When Cicero wrote to his friends, he avoided telling them of his affairs.'"

In May 1793, Da Ponte wrote from London: "Count Waldstein has lived a very obscure life in London, badly lodged, badly dressed, badly served, always in cabarets, cafes, with porters, with rascals, with . . . we will leave out the rest. He has the heart of an angel and an excellent character, but not so good a head as ours. . . ."

Toward the end of 1792, Casanova wrote a letter to Robespierre, which, as he advises M. Opiz, the 13th January 1793, occupied one hundred and twenty folio pages. This letter was not to be found at Dux and it may possibly have been sent, or may have been destroyed by Casanova on the advice of Abbé O'Kelly. Casanova's feelings were very bitter over the trial of Louis XVI., and in his letters to M. Opiz he complained bitterly of the Jacobins and predicted the ruin of France. Certainly, to Casanova, the French Revolution represented the complete overthrow of many of his cherished illusions.

On the 1st August 1793, Wilhelmina Rietz, Countess Lichtenau (called the Pompadour of Frederic-William II., King of Prussia) wrote to the librarian at Dux:

"Monsieur:

"It seems impossible to know where Count Valstaine [Waldstein] is staying, whether he is in Europe, Africa, America, or possibly the Megamiques. If he is there, you are the only one who could insure his receiving the enclosed letter.

"For my part, I have not yet had time to read their history, but the first reading I do will assuredly be that.

"Mademoiselle Chappuis has the honor of recalling herself to your memory, and I have that of being your very humble servant,

Wilhelmina Rietz."

The allusions to a "history" and to the Megamiques in this letter refer to Casanova's romance, Icosameron.

About this time, Count Waldstein returned to Dux after having been, at Paris, according to Da Ponte, concerned in planning the flight of Louis XVI., and in attempting to save the Princess Lamballe. On the 17th August, Casanova replied to the above letter:

"Madame,

"I handed the Count your letter two minutes after having received it, finding him easily. I told him that he should respond at once, for the post was ready to go; but, as he begged to wait for the following ordinary, I did not insist. The day before yesterday, he begged me to wait again, but he did not find me so complaisant. I respond to you, Madame, for his carelessness in replying to letters is extreme; he is so shameful that he is in despair when he is obliged to it. Although he may not respond, be sure of seeing him at your house at Berlin after the Leipzig Fair, with a hundred bad excuses which you will laugh at and pretend to believe good ones. . . . This last month, my wish to see Berlin again has become immeasurable, and I will do my best to have Count Waldstein take me there in the month of October or at least to permit me to go. . . . You have given me an idea of Berlin far different than that the city left with me when I passed four months there twenty-nine years ago. . . . If my Icosameron interests you, I offer you its Spirit. I wrote it here two years ago and I would not have published it if I had not dared hope that the Theological Censor would permit it. At Berlin no one raised the least difficulty. . . . If circumstances do not permit me to pay you my respects at Berlin, I hope for the happiness of seeing you here next year. . . ."

Sometime after this and following his quarrel with M. Opiz, Casanova evidently passed through a period of depression, as indicated by a manuscript at Dux, headed "Short reflection of a philosopher who finds himself thinking of procuring his own death," and dated "the 13th December 1793, the day dedicated to S. Lucie, remarkable in my too long life."

"Life is a burden to me. What is the metaphysical being who prevents me from slaying myself? It is Nature. What is the other being who enjoins me to lighten the burdens of that life which brings me only feeble pleasures and heavy pains? It is Reason. Nature is a coward which, demanding only conservation, orders me to sacrifice all to its existence. Reason is a being which gives me resemblance to God, which treads instinct under foot and which teaches me to choose the best way after having well considered the reasons. It demonstrates to me that I am a man in imposing silence on the Nature which opposes that action which alone could remedy all my ills.

"Reason convinces me that the power I have of slaying myself is a privilege given me by God, by which I perceive that I am superior to all animals created in the world; for there is no animal who can slay itself nor think of slaying itself, except the scorpion, which poisons itself, but only when the fire which surrounds it convinces it that it cannot save itself from being burned. This animal slays itself because it fears fire more than death. Reason tells me imperiously that I have the right to slay myself, with the divine oracle of Cen: 'Qui non potest vivere bene non vivat male.' These eight words have such power that it is impossible that a man to whom life is a burden could do other than slay himself on first hearing them."

Certainly, however, Casanova did not deceive himself with these sophisms, and Nature, who for many years had unquestionably lavished her gifts on him, had her way.

Over the end of the year, the two mathematicians, Casanova and Opiz, at the request of Count Waldstein, made a scientific examination of the reform of the calendar as decreed the 5th October 1793 by the National Convention.

In January 1795, Casanova wrote to the Princess Lobkowitz to thank her for her gift of a little dog. On the 16th the Princess wrote from Vienna:

"Monsieur,

"I am enchanted at the charming reception you accorded the dog which I sent you when I learned of the death of your well-loved greyhound, knowing that she would nowhere be better cared for than with you, Monsieur. I hope with all my heart that she has all the qualities which may, in some fashion, help you to forget the deceased. . . ."

In the autumn of 1795, Casanova left Dux. The Prince de Ligne writes in his Memoirs: "God directed him to leave Dux. Scarcely believing in more than his death, which he no longer doubted, he pretended that each thing he had done was by the direction of God and this was his guide. God directed him to ask me for letters of recommendation to the Duke of Weimar, who was my good friend, to the Duchess of Gotha, who did not know me, and to the Jews of Berlin. And he departed secretly, leaving for Count Waldstein a letter at once tender, proud, honest and irritating. .Waldstein laughed and said he would return. Casanova waited in ante-chambers; no one would place him either as governor, librarian or chamberlain. He said everywhere that the Germans were thorough beasts. The excellent and very amiable Duke of Weimer welcomed him wonderfully; but in an instant he became jealous of Goethe and Wieland, who were under the Duke's protection. He declaimed against them and against the literature of the country which he did not, and could not, know. At Berlin, he declaimed against the ignorance, the superstition and the knavery of the Hebrews to whom I had addressed him, drawing meanwhile, for the money they claimed of him, bills of exchange on the Count who laughed, paid, and embraced him when he returned. Casanova laughed, wept, and told him that God had ordered him to make this trip of six weeks, to leave without speaking of it, and to return to his chamber at Dux. Enchanted at seeing us again, he agreeably related to us all the misfortunes which had tried him and to which his susceptibility gave the name of humiliations. 'I am proud,' he said, 'because I am nothing. . . .' Eight days after his return, what new troubles! Everyone had been served strawberries before him, and none remained for him."

The Prince de Ligne, although he was Casanova's sincere friend and admirer, gives a rather somber picture of Casanova's life at Dux: "It must not be imagined that he was satisfied to live quietly in the refuge provided him through the kindness of Waldstein. That was not within his nature. Not a day passed without trouble; something was certain to be wrong with the coffee, the milk, the dish of macaroni, which he required each day. There were always quarrels in the house. The cook had ruined his polenta; the coachman had given him a bad driver to bring him to see me; the dogs had barked all night; there had been more guests than usual and he had found it necessary to eat at a side table. Some hunting-horn had tormented his ear with its blasts; the priest had been trying to convert him; Count Waldstein had not anticipated his morning greeting; the servant had delayed with his wine; he had not been introduced to some distinguished personage who had come to see the lance which had pierced the side of the great Wallenstein; the Count had lent a book without telling him; a groom had not touched his hat to him; his German speech had been misunderstood; he had become angry and people had laughed at him."

Like Count Waldstein, however, the Prince de Ligne made the widest allowances, understanding the chafing of Casanova's restless spirit. "Casanova has a mind without an equal, from which each word is extraordinary and each thought a book."

On the 16th December, he wrote Casanova: "One is never old with your heart, your genius and your stomach."

Casanova's own comment on his trip away from Dux will be found in the Memoirs. "Two years ago, I set out for Hamburg, but my good genius made me return to Dux. What had I to do at Hamburg?"

On the 10th December, Casanova's brother Giovanni [Jean] died. He was the Director of the Academy of Painting at Dresden. Apparently the two brothers could not remain friends.

Giovanni left two daughters, Teresa and Augusta, and two sons, Carlo and Lorenzo. While he was unable to remain friendly with his brother, Casanova apparently wished to be of assistance to his nieces, who were not in the best of circumstances, and he exchanged a number of letters with Teresa after her father's death.

On the occasion of Teresa Casanova's visit to Vienna in 1792, Princess Clari, oldest sister of the Prince de Ligne, wrote of her: "She is charming in every way, pretty as love, always amiable; she has had great success. Prince Kaunitz loves her to the point of madness."

In a letter of the 25th April 1796, Teresa assured her "very amiable and very dear uncle" that the cautions, which occupied three-fourths of his letter, were unnecessary; and compared him with his brother François, to the injury of the latter. On the 5th May, Teresa wrote: "Before thanking you for your charming letter, my very kind uncle, I should announce the issue of our pension of one hundred and sixty crowns a year, which is to say, eighty crowns apiece; I am well satisfied for I did not hope to receive so much." In the same letter, Teresa spoke of seeing much of a "charming man," Don Antonio, who was no other than the rascally adventurer Don Antonio della Croce with whom Casanova had been acquainted since 1753, who assisted Casanova in losing a thousand sequins at Milan in 1763; who in 1767, at Spa, following financial reverses, abandoned his pregnant mistress to the charge of Casanova; and who in August 1795, wrote to Casanova: "Your letter gave me great pleasure as the sweet souvenir of our old friendship, unique and faithful over a period of fifty years."

It is probable that, at this time, Casanova visited Dresden and Berlin also. In his letter "To Leonard Snetlage," he writes: "'That which proves that revolution should arrive,' a profound thinker said to me in Berlin, last year, 'is that it has arrived.'"

On the 1st March, 1798, Carlo Angiolini, the son of Maria Maddalena, Casanova's sister, wrote to Casanova: "This evening, Teresa will marry M. le Chambellan de Veisnicht [Von Wessenig] whom you know well." This desirable marriage received the approval of Francesco also. Teresa, as the Baroness Wessenig, occupied a prominent social position at Dresden. She died in 1842.

Between the 13th February and the 6th December 1796, Casanova engaged in a correspondence with Mlle. Henriette de Schuckmann who was visiting at Bayreuth. This Henriette (unfortunately not the Henriette of the Memoirs whose "forty letters" to Casanova apparently have not been located), had visited the library at Dux in the summer of 1786. "I was with the Chamberlain Freiberg, and I was greatly moved, as much by your conversation as by your kindness which provided me with a beautiful edition of Metastasio, elegantly bound in red morocco." Finding herself at Bayreuth in an enforced idleness and wishing a stimulant, wishing also to borrow some books, she wrote Casanova, under the auspices of Count Koenig, a mutual friend, the 13th February 1796, recalling herself to his memory. Casanova responded to her overtures and five of her letters were preserved at Dux. On the 28th May Henriette wrote:

"But certainly, my good friend, your letters have given me the greatest pleasure, and it is with a rising satisfaction that I pore over all you say to me. I love, I esteem, I cherish your frankness. . . . I understand you perfectly and I love to distraction the lively and energetic manner with which you express yourself."

On the 30th September, she wrote: "You will read to-day, if you please, a weary letter; for your silence, Monsieur, has given me humors. A promise is a debt, and in your last letter you promised to write me at least a dozen pages. I have every right to call you a bad debtor; I could summon you before a court of justice; but all these acts of vengeance would not repair the loss which I have endured through my hope and my fruitless waiting. . . . It is your punishment to read this trivial page; but although my head is empty, my heart is not so, and it holds for you a very living friendship."

In March 1797, this Henriette went to Lausanne and in May from there to her father's home at Mecklenburg.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH JEAN-FERDINAND OPIZ

On the 27th July 1792, Casanova wrote M. Opiz that he had finished the twelfth volume of his Memoirs, with his age at forty-seven years [1772]. "Our late friend, the worthy Count Max Josef Lamberg," he added, "could not bear the idea of my burning my Memoirs, and expecting to survive me, had persuaded me to send him the first four volumes. But now there is no longer any question that his good soul has left his organs. Three weeks ago I wept for his death, all the more so as he would still be living if he had listened to me. I am, perhaps, the only one who knows the truth. He who slew him was the surgeon Feuchter at Cremsir, who applied thirty-six mercurial plasters on a gland in his left groin which was swollen but not by the pox, as I am sure by the description he gave me of the cause of the swelling. The mercury mounted to his esophagus and, being able to swallow neither solids nor fluids, he died the 23rd June of positive famine. . . . The interest of the bungling surgeon is to say that he died of the pox. This is not true, I beg you to give the lie to anyone you hear saying it. I have before my eyes four hundred and sixty of his letters over which I weep and which I will burn. I have asked Count Leopold to burn mine, which he had saved, and I hope that he will please me by doing it. I have survived all my true friends. 'Tempus abire mihi est' Horace says to me.

"Returning to my Memoirs . . . I am a detestable man; but I do not care about having it known, and I do not aspire to the honor of the detestation of posterity. My work is full of excellent moral instructions. But to what good, if the charming descriptions of my offences excite the readers more to action than to repentance? Furthermore, knowing readers would divine the names of all the women and of the men which I have masked, whose transgressions are unknown to the world, my indiscretion would injure them, they would cry out against my perfidy, even though every word of my history were true. . . . Tell me yourself whether or not I should burn my work? I am curious to have your advice."

On the 6th May 1793, Casanova wrote Opiz: "The letter of recommendation you ask of me to the professor my brother for your younger son, honors me; and there is no doubt that, having for you all the estimation your qualities merit, I should send it to you immediately. But this cannot be. And here is the reason. My brother is my enemy; he has given me sure indications of it and it appears that his hate will not cease until I no longer exist. I hope that he may long survive me and be happy. This desire is my only apology."

"The epigraph of the little work which I would give to the public," Casanova wrote the 23rd August 1793, "is In pondere et mensura. It is concerned with gravity and measure. I would demonstrate not only that the course of the stars is irregular but also that it is susceptible only to approximate measures and that consequently we must join physical and moral calculations in establishing celestial movements. For I prove that all fixed axes must have a necessarily irregular movement of oscillation, from which comes a variation in all the necessary curves of the planets which compose their eccentricities and their orbits. I demonstrate that light has neither body nor spirit; I demonstrate that it comes in an instant from its respective star; I demonstrate the impossibility of many parallaxes and the uselessness of many others. I criticize not only Tiko-Brahi, but also Kepler and Newton. . . .

"I wish to send you my manuscript and give you the trouble of publishing it with my name at Prague or elsewhere. . . . I will sell it to the printer or to yourself for fifty florins and twenty-five copies on fine paper when it is printed."

But Opiz replied:

"As the father of a family, I do not feel myself authorized to dispose of my revenues on the impulse of my fancy or as my heart suggests . . . and no offer of yours could make me a book-seller."

This shows plainly enough that Opiz, for all his interest in Casanova, had not the qualities of true friendship.

On the 6th September 1793, Casanova wrote:

"I will have my Reveries printed at Dresden, and I will be pleased to send you a copy. I laughed a little at your fear that I would take offense because you did not want my manuscript by sending me the ridiculous sum I named to you. This refusal, my dear friend, did not offend me. On the contrary it was useful as an aid in knowing character. Add to this that in making the offer I thought to make you a gift. Fear nothing from the event. Your system of economy will never interfere with either my proceedings or my doctrines; and I am in no need of begging you, for I think that your action followed only your inclination and consequently your greatest pleasure."

On the insistence of Opiz, Casanova continued his correspondence, but he passed over nothing more, neither in exact quotations from Latin authors, nor solecisms, nor lame reasonings. He even reproached him for his poor writing and did not cease joking at the philanthropic and amiable sentiments Opiz loved to parade while at the same time keeping his purse-strings tight. A number of quarreling letters followed, after which the correspondence came to an end. One of Casanova's last letters, that of the 2nd February 1794, concludes: "One day M. de Bragadin said to me: 'Jacques, be careful never to convince a quibbler, for he will become your enemy.' After this wise advice I avoided syllogism, which tended toward conviction. But in spite of this you have become my enemy. . . ."

Among the Casanova manuscripts at Dux was one giving his final comment on his relations with Opiz. Accusing Opiz of bringing about a quarrel, Casanova nevertheless admits that he himself may not be blameless, but lays this to his carelessness. "I have a bad habit," he writes, "of not reading over my letters. If, in re-reading those I wrote to M. Opiz, I had found them bitter, I would have burned them." Probably Casanova struck the root of the matter in his remark, "Perfect accord is the first charm of a reciprocal friendship." The two men were primarily of so different a temperament, that they apparently could not long agree even on subjects on which they were most in accord.

The complete correspondence is of very considerable interest.

PUBLICATIONS

In 1786, Casanova published Le soliloque d'un penseur, in which he speaks of Saint-Germain and of Cagliostro. On the 23rd December 1792, Zaguri wrote Casanova that Cagliostro was in prison at San Leo. "Twenty years ago, I told Cagliostro not to set his foot in Rome, and if he had followed this advice he would not have died miserably in a Roman prison."

In January 1788, appeared Icosameron a romance in five volumes, dedicated to Count Waldstein, which he describes as "translated from the English." This fanciful romance, which included philosophic and theological discussions, was the original work of Casanova and not a translation. It was criticized in 1789 by a literary journal at Jena. Preserved at Dux were several manuscripts with variants of Icosameron and also an unpublished reply to the criticism.

In 1788 Casanova published the history of his famous flight from The Leads. An article on this book appeared in the German Litteratur-Zeitung, 29th June 1789: "As soon as the history was published and while it was exciting much interest among us and among our neighbors, it was seen that other attempts at flight from prisons would make their appearance. The subject in itself is captivating; all prisoners awake our compassion, particularly when they are enclosed in a severe prison and are possibly innocent. . . . The history with which we are concerned has all the appearances of truth; many Venetians have testified to it, and the principal character, M. Casanova, brother of the celebrated painter, actually lives at Dux in Bohemia where the Count Waldstein has established him as guardian of his important library."

In July 1789 there was discovered, among the papers of the Bastille, the letter which Casanova wrote from Augsburg in May 1767 to Prince Charles of Courlande on the subject of fabricating gold. Carra published this letter at once in the third volume of his Mémoirs authentiques et historiques sur la Bastille. Casanova kept a copy of this letter and includes it in the Memoirs.

In October 1789, Casanova wrote M. Opiz that he was writing to a professor of mathematics [M. Lagrange] at Paris, a long letter in Italian, on the duplication of the cube, which he wished to publish. In August 1790, Casanova published his Solution du Problème Déliaque démontrée and Deux corollaires à la duplication de hexaèdre. On the subject of his pretended solution of this problem in speculative mathematics, Casanova engaged with M. Opiz in a heated technical discussion between the 16th September and 1st November 1790. Casanova sought vainly to convince Opiz of the correctness of his solution. Finally, M. Opiz, tired of the polemics, announced that he was leaving on a six-weeks tour of inspection and that he would not be able to occupy himself with the duplication of the cube for some time to come. On the 1st November, Casanova wished him a pleasant journey and advised him to guard against the cold because "health is the soul of life."

In 1797, appeared the last book published during Casanova's lifetime, a small work entitled: A Leonard Snetlage, docteur en droit de l'Université de Gœttingue, Jacques Casanova, docteur en droit de l'Université de Padoue. This was a careful criticism of the neologisms introduced into French by the Revolution. In reference to Casanova's title of "Doctor," researches by M. Favoro at the University of Padua had failed to establish this claim, although, in the Memoirs Casanova had written: "I remained at Padua long enough to prepare myself for the Doctor's degree, which I intended to take the following year." With this devil of a man, it is always prudent to look twice before peremptorily questioning the truth of his statement. And in fact, the record of Casanova's matriculation was discovered by Signor Bruno Brunelli and announced in the Literary Supplement of Figaro, the 1st September 1923.

SUMMARY OF MY LIFE

The 2nd November, 1797, Cecilia Roggendorff wrote to Casanova: "By the way, how do you call yourself, by your baptismal name? On what day and in what year were you born? You may laugh, if you wish, at my questions, but I command you to satisfy me . . ." To this request, Casanova responded with:

"Summary of My Life:—My mother brought me into the world at Venice on the 2nd April, Easter day of the year 1725. She had, the night before, a strong desire for crawfish. I am very fond of them.

"At baptism, I was named Jacques-Jerome. I was an idiot until I was eight-and-a-half years old. After having had a hemorrhage for three months, I was taken to Padua, where, cured of my imbecility, I applied myself to study and, at the age of sixteen years I was made a doctor and given the habit of a priest so that I might go seek my fortune at Rome.

"At Rome, the daughter of my French instructor was the cause of my being dismissed by my patron, Cardinal Aquaviva.

"At the age of eighteen years, I entered the military service of my country, and I went to Constantinople. Two years afterward, having returned to Venice, I left the profession of honor and, taking the bit in my teeth, embraced the wretched profession of a violinist. I horrified my friends, but this did not last for very long.

"At the age of twenty-one years, one of the highest nobles of Venice adopted me as his son, and, having become rich, I went to see Italy, France, Germany and Vienna where I knew Count Roggendorff. I returned to Venice, where, two years later, the State Inquisitors of Venice, for just and wise reasons, imprisoned me under The Leads.

"This was the state prison, from which no one had ever escaped, but, with the aid of God, I took flight at the end of fifteen months and went to Paris. In two years, my affairs prospered so well that I became worth a million, but, all the same, I went bankrupt. I made money in Holland; suffered misfortune in Stuttgart; was received with honors in Switzerland; visited M. de Voltaire; adventured in Genoa, Marseilles, Florence and in Rome where the Pope Rezzonico, a Venetian, made me a Chevalier of Saint-Jean-Latran and an apostolic protonotary. This was in the year 1760.

"In the same year I found good fortune at Naples; at Florence I carried off a girl; and, the following year, I was to attend the Congress at Augsburg, charged with a commission from the King of Portugal. The Congress did not meet there and, after the publication of peace, I passed on into England, which great misfortunes caused me to leave in the following year, 1764. I avoided the gibbet which, however, should not have dishonored me as I should only have been hung. In the same year I searched in vain for fortune at Berlin and at Petersburg, but I found it at Warsaw in the following year. Nine months afterwards, I lost it through being embroiled in a pistol duel with General Branicki; I pierced his abdomen but in eight months he was well again and I was very much pleased. He was a brave man. Obliged to leave Poland, I returned to Paris in 1767, but a lettre de cachet obliged me to leave and I went to Spain where I met with great misfortunes. I committed the crime of making nocturnal visits to the mistress of the vice-roi, who was a great scoundrel.

"At the frontiers of Spain, I escaped from assassins only to suffer, at Aix, in Provence, an illness which took me to the edge of the grave, after spitting blood for eighteen months.

"In the year 1769, I published my Defense of the Government of Venice, in three large volumes, written against Amelot de la Houssaie.

"In the following year the English Minister at the Court of Turin sent me, well recommended, to Leghorn. I wished to go to Constantinople with the Russian fleet, but as Admiral Orlof, would not meet my conditions, I retraced my steps and went to Rome under the pontificate of Ganganelli.

"A happy love affair made me leave Rome and go to Naples and, three months later, an unhappy love made me return to Rome. I had measured swords for the third time with Count Medini who died four years ago at London, in prison for his debts.

"Having considerable money, I went to Florence, where, during the Christmas Festival, the Archduke Leopold, the Emperor who died four or five years ago, ordered me to leave his dominions within three days. I had a mistress who, by my advice, became Marquise de * * * at Bologna.

"Weary of running about Europe, I determined to solicit mercy from the Venetian State Inquisitors. For this purpose, I established myself at Trieste where, two years later, I obtained it. This was the 14th September 1774. My return to Venice after nineteen years was the most pleasant moment of my life.

"In 1782, I became embroiled with the entire body of the Venetian nobility. At the beginning of 1783, I voluntarily left the ungrateful country and went to Vienna. Six months later I went to Paris with the intention of establishing myself there, but my brother, who had lived there for twenty-six years, made me forget my interests in favor of his. I rescued him from the hands of his wife and took him to Vienna where Prince Kaunitz engaged him to establish himself. He is still there, older than I am by two years.

"I placed myself in the service of M. Foscarini, Venetian Ambassador, to write dispatches. Two years later, he died in my arms, killed by the gout which mounted into his chest. I then set out for Berlin in the hope of securing a position with the Academy, but, half way there, Count Waldstein stopped me at Teplitz and led me to Dux where I still am and where, according to all appearances, I shall die.

"This is the only summary of my life that I have written, and I permit any use of it which may be desired.

"Non erubesco evangelium.

"This 17th November 1797.

Jacques Casanova."

LAST DAYS AT DUX

Scattered through the Memoirs are many of Casanova's thoughts about his old age. Some were possibly incorporated in the original text, others possibly added when he revised the text in 1797. These vary from resignation to bitterness, doubtless depending on Casanova's state of mind at the moment he wrote them:

"Now that I am seventy-two years old, I believe myself no longer susceptible of such follies. But alas! that is the very thing which causes me to be miserable."

"I hate old age which offers only what I already know, unless I should take up a gazette."

"Age has calmed my passions by rendering them powerless, but my heart has not grown old and my memory has kept all the freshness of youth."

"No, I have not forgotten her [Henriette]; for even now, when my head is covered with white hair, the recollection of her is still a source of happiness for my heart."

"A scene which, even now, excites my mirth."

"Age, that cruel and unavoidable disease, compels me to be in good health, in spite of myself."

"Now that I am but the shadow of the once brilliant Casanova, I love to chatter."

"Now that age has whitened my hair and deadened the ardor of my senses, my imagination does not take such a high flight and I think differently."

"What embitters my old age is that, having a heart as warm as ever, I have no longer the strength necessary to secure a single day as blissful as those which I owed to this charming girl."

"When I recall these events, I grow young again and feel once more the delights of youth, despite the long years which separate me from that happy time."

"Now that I am getting into my dotage, I look on the dark side of everything. I am invited to a wedding and see naught but gloom; and, witnessing the coronation of Leopold II, at Prague, I say to myself, Nolo coronari. Cursed old age, thou art only worthy of dwelling in hell."

"The longer I live, the more interest I take in my papers. They are the treasure which attaches me to life and makes death more hateful still."

And so on, through the Memoirs, Casanova supplies his own picture, knowing very well that the end, even of his cherished memories, is not far distant.

In 1797, Casanova relates an amusing, but irritating incident, which resulted in the loss of the first three chapters of the second volume of the Memoirs through the carelessness of a servant girl at Dux who took the papers "old, written upon, covered with scribbling and erasures," for "her own purposes," thus necessitating a re-writing, "which I must now abridge," of these chapters. Thirty years before, Casanova would doubtless have made love to the girl and all would have been forgiven. But, alas for the "hateful old age" permitting no relief except irritation and impotent anger!

On the 1st August, 1797, Cecilia Roggendorff, the daughter of the Count Roggendorff [printed Roquendorf] whom Casanova had met at Vienna in 1753, wrote: "You tell me in one of your letters that, at your death, you will leave me, by your will, your Memoirs which occupy twelve volumes."

At this time, Casanova was revising, or had completed his revision of, the twelve volumes. In July 1792, as mentioned above, Casanova wrote Opiz that he had arrived at the twelfth volume. In the Memoirs themselves we read, ". . . the various adventures which, at the age of seventy-two years, impel me to write these Memoirs . . .," written probably during a revision in 1797.

At the beginning of one of the two chapters of the last volume, which were missing until discovered by Arthur Symons at Dux in 1899, we read: "When I left Venice in the year 1783, God ought to have sent me to Rome, or to Naples, or to Sicily, or to Parma, where my old age, according to all appearances, might have been happy. My genius, who is always right, led me to Paris, so that I might see my brother François, who had run into debt and who was just then going to the Temple. I do not care whether or not he owes me his regeneration, but I am glad to have effected it. If he had been grateful to me, I should have felt myself paid; it seems to me much better that he should carry the burden of his debt on his shoulders, which from time to time he ought to find heavy. He does not deserve a worse punishment. To-day, in the seventy-third year of my life, my only desire is to live in peace and to be far from any person who might imagine that he has rights over my moral liberty, for it is impossible that any kind of tyranny should not coincide with this imagination."

Early in February, 1798, Casanova was taken sick with a very grave bladder trouble of which he died after suffering for three-and-a-half months. On the 16th February Zaguri wrote: "I note with the greatest sorrow the blow which has afflicted you." On the 31st March, after having consulted with a Prussian doctor, Zaguri sent a box of medicines and he wrote frequently until the end.

On the 20th April Elisa von der Recke, whom Casanova had met, some years before, at the château of the Prince de Ligne at Teplitz, having returned to Teplitz, wrote: "Your letter, my friend, has deeply affected me. Although myself ill, the first fair day which permits me to go out will find me at your side." On the 27th, Elisa, still bedridden, wrote that the Count de Montboisier and his wife were looking forward to visiting Casanova. On the 6th May she wrote, regretting that she was unable to send some crawfish soup, but that the rivers were too high for the peasants to secure the crawfish. "The Montboisier family, Milady Clark, my children and myself have all made vows for your recovery." On the 8th, she sent bouillon and madeira.

On the 4th June, 1798, Casanova died. His nephew, Carlo Angiolini was with him at the time. He was buried in the churchyard of Santa Barbara at Dux. The exact location of his grave is uncertain, but a tablet, placed against the outside wall of the church reads:

I. The Chateau at Dux.

It is uncertain how long Casanova remained at Carlsbad. While there, however, he met again the Polish nobleman Zawoiski, with whom he had gambled in Venice in 1746. "As to Zawoiski, I did not tell him the story until I met him in Carlsbad old and deaf, forty years later." (II, 5). He did not return to Czaslau, but in September 1785 he was at Teplitz where he found Count Waldstein whom he accompanied to his chateau at Dux.

From this time onward he remained almost constantly at the chateau where he was placed in charge of the Count's library and given a pension of one thousand florins annually.

Describing his visit to the chateau in 1899, Arthur Symons writes: "I had the sensation of an enormous building: all Bohemian castles are big, but this one was like a royal palace. Set there in the midst of the town, after the Bohemian fashion, it opens at the back upon great gardens, as if it were in the midst of the country. I walked through room after room, corridor after corridor; everywhere there were pictures, everywhere portraits of Wallenstein, and battle scenes in which he led on his troops, The library, which was formed, or at least arranged, by Casanova, and which remains as he left it, contains some twenty-five thousand volumes, some of them of considerable value. . . The library forms part of the Museum, which occupies a ground-floor wing of the castle. The first room is an armory, in which all kinds of arms are arranged, in a decorative way, covering the ceiling and the walls with strange patterns. The second rooms contains pottery, collected by Casanova's Waldstein on his Eastern travels. The third room is full of curious mechanical toys, and cabinets, and carvings in ivory. Finally, we come to the library, contained in the two innermost rooms. The book shelves are painted white and reach to the low vaulted ceilings, which are whitewashed. At the end of a bookcase, in the corner of one of the windows, hangs a fine engraved portrait of Casanova."

In this elaborate setting, Casanova found the refuge he so sadly needed for his last years. The evil days of Venice and Vienna, and the problems and makeshifts of mere existence, were left behind. And for this refuge he paid the world with his Memoirs.

II. Letters From Francesca.

In 1786, Casanova renewed his correspondence with Francesca, who wrote:

III. Correspondence and Activities.

In 1787, a book was published under the title of Dreissig Brief uber Galizien by Traunpaur, which included this passage: "The most famous adventurers of two sorts (there are two, in fact: honest adventurers and adventurers of doubtful reputation) have appeared on the scene of the kingdom of Poland. The best known on the shores of the Vistula are: the miraculous Cagliostro: Boisson de Quency, grand charlatan, soldier of fortune, decorated with many orders, member of numerous Academies: the Venetian Casanova of Saint-Gall, a true savant, who fought a duel with Count Braniki: the Baron de Poellnitz . . . the lucky Count Tomatis, who knew so well how to correct fortune, and many others."

In June 1789, Casanova received a letter from Teresa Boisson de Quency, the wife of the adventurer above referred to.

"Much honored Monsieur Giacomo:

"For a long time I have felt a very particular desire to evidence to you the estimation due your spirit and your eminent qualities: the superb sonnet augmented my wish. But the inconveniences of childbirth and the cares required by a little girl whom I adore, made me defer this pleasure. During my husband's absence, your last and much honored letter came to my hands. Your amiable compliments to me, engage me to take the pen to give you renewed assurance that you have in me a sincere admirer of your great talent. . . When I wish to point out a person who writes and thinks with excellence, I name Monsieur Casanova. . ."

In 1793, Teresa de Quency wished to return to Venice at which time Zaguri wrote Casanova: "The Bassani has received letters from her husband which tell her nothing more than that he is alive."

Casanova passed the months of May, June and July 1788 at Prague, supervising the printing of the "Histoire de ma fuite."

"I remember laughing very heartily at Prague, six years ago, on learning that some thin-skinned ladies, on reading my flight from The Leads, which was published at that date, took great offense at the above account, which they thought I should have done well to leave out." (IV, 9).

In May he was troubled with an attack of the grippe. In October, he was in Dresden, apparently with his brother. Around this time "The Magdalene" a painting by Correggio was stolen from the Museum of the Elector.

On the 30th October 1788, Casanova wrote to the Prince Belozelski, Russian Minister to the Court of Dresden: "Tuesday morning, after having embraced my dear brother, I got into a carriage to return here. At the barrier on the outskirts of Dresden, I was obliged to descend, and six men carried the two chests of my carriage, my two night-bags and my capelière into a little chamber on the ground level, demanded my keys, and examined everything. . . The youngest of these infamous executors of such an order told me they were searching for the Magdalene. . . The oldest had the impudence to put his hands on my waistcoat. . . At last they let me go.

"This, my prince, delayed me so that I could not reach Petervalden by daylight. I stopped at an evil tavern where, dying of famine and rage, I ate everything I saw; and, wishing to drink and not liking beer, I gulped down some beverage which my host told me was good and which did not seem unpleasant. He told me that it was Pilnitz Moste. This beverage aroused a rebellion in my guts. I passed the night tormented by a continual diarrhoea. I arrived here the day before yesterday (the 28th), where I found an unpleasant duty awaiting me. Two months ago, I brought a woman here to cook, needing her while the Count is away; as soon as she arrived, I gave her a room and I went to Leipzig. On returning here, I found three servants in the hands of surgeons and all three blame my cook for putting them in such a state. The Count's courier had already told me, at Leipzig, that she had crippled him. Yesterday the Count arrived and would do nothing but laugh, but I have sent her back and exhorted her to imitate the Magdalene. The amusing part is that she is old, ugly and ill-smelling."

In 1789, 1791 and 1792, Casanova received three letters from Maddalena Allegranti, the niece of J. B. Allegranti the innkeeper with whom Casanova lodged at Florence in 1771. "This young person, still a child, was so pretty, so gracious, with such spirit and such charms, that she incessantly distracted me. Sometimes she would come into my chamber to wish me good-morning. . . Her appearance, her grace, the sound of her voice. . . were more than I could resist; and, fearing the seduction would excuse mine, I could find no other expedient than to take flight. . . Some years later, Maddalena became a celebrated musician. . ." (XII, 9).

At this period of Casanova's life, we hear again of the hussy who so upset Casanova during his visit to London that he was actually on the point of committing suicide through sheer desperation. (X, 2). On the 20th September 1789, he wrote to the Princess Clari, daughter of the Prince de Ligne: "I am struck by a woman at first sight, she completely ravishes me, and I am perhaps lost, for she may be a Charpillon."

There were, among the papers at Dux, two letters from Marianne Charpillon, and a manuscript outlining the story of Casanova's relations with her and her family, as detailed in the Memoirs. (IX, 11, etc). With the story in mind, the letters from this girl, "the mistress, now of one, now of another", are of interest.

"I know not, Monsieur, whether you forgot the engagement Saturday last; as for me, I remember that you consented to give us the pleasure of having you at dinner today, Monday, the 12th of the month. I would greatly like to know whether your ill-humor has left you; this would please me. Farewell, in awaiting the honor of seeing you.

Marianne de Charpillon"

"Monsieur,

As I have a part in all which concerns you, I am greatly put out to know of the new illness which incommodes you; I hope that this will be so trifling that we will have the pleasure of seeing you well and at our house, today or tomorrow.

"And, in truth, the gift which you sent me is so pretty that I know not how to express to you the pleasure it has given me and how much I value it; and I cannot see why you must always provoke me by telling me that it is my fault that you are filled with bile, while I am as innocent as a new-born babe and would wish you so gentle and patient that your blood would become a true clarified syrup; this will come to you if you follow my advice. I am, Monsieur,

Your very humble servant,
(Marianne Charpillon)
Wednesday at six o'clock."

On the 8th April, 1790, Zaguri wrote in reference to vertigo of which Casanova complained:: "Have you tried riding horseback? Do you not think that is an excellent preservative? I tried it this last summer and I find myself very well."

In 1790, Casanova had a conversation with the Emperor Joseph II at Luxemburg, on the subject of purchased nobility, which he reports in the Memoirs. (III, 10).

This same year, attending the coronation of Leopold at Prague, Casanova met his grandson (and, probably, as he himself believed, his own son), the son of Leonilda, who was the daughter of Casanova and Donna Lucrezia, and who was married to the Marquis C . . . (XII, 6). In 1792, Leonilda wrote, inviting Casanova to "spend the remainder of my days with her."

In February 1791, Casanova wrote to Countess Lamberg: "I have in my capitularies more than four hundred sentences which pass for aphorisms and which include all the tricks which place one word for another. One can read in Livy that Hannibal overcame the Alps by means of vinegar. No elephant ever uttered such a stupidity. Livy? Not at all. Livy was not a beast; it is you who are, foolish instructor of credulous youth! Livy did not say aceto which means vinegar, but aceta which means axe."

In April 1791, Casanova wrote to Carlo Grimani at Venice, stating that he felt he had committed a great fault in publishing his libel, Ne amori ne donne, and very humbly begging his pardon. Also that his Memoirs would be composed of six volumes in octavio with a seventh, supplementary volume containing codicils.

In June, Casanova composed for the theater of Princess Clari, at Teplitz, a piece entitled: Le Polémoscope ou la Calomnie démasquée par la présence d'esprit, tragi-comédie en trois actes. The manuscript was preserved at Dux, together with another form of the same, having the sub-title of La-Lorgnette Menteuse ou la Calomnie demasquée. It may be assumed that the staging of this piece was an occasion of pleasant activity for Casanova.

In January 1792, during Count Waldstein's absence in London or Paris, Casanova was embroiled with M. Faulkircher, maitre d'hotel, over the unpleasant matter indicated in two of Casanova's letter's to this functionary:

"Your rascally Viderol. . . tore my portrait out of one of my books, scrawled my name on it, with the epithet which you taught him and then stuck it on the door of the privy. . ."

"Determined to make sure of the punishment of your infamous valet, and wishing at the same time to give proof of my respect for Count Waldstein, not forgetting that, as a last resort, I have the right to invade his jurisdiction, I took an advocate, wrote my complaint and had it translated into German. . . Having heard of this at Teplitz, and having known that I would not save your name, you came to my chamber to beg me to write whatever I wished but not to name you because it would place you wrong before the War Council and expose you to the loss of your pension. . . I have torn up my first complaint and have written a second in Latin, which an advocate of Bilin has translated for me and which I have deposited at the office of the judiciary at Dux. . ."

Following this matter, Casanova attended the Carnival at Oberleutensdorf, and left at Dux a manuscript headed Passe temps de Jacques Casanova de Seingalt pour le carnaval de l'an 1792 dans le bourg d'Oberleutensdorf. While in that city, meditating on the Faulkircher incident, he wrote also Les quinze pardons, monologue nocturne du bib- liothécaire, also preserved in manuscript at Dux, in which we read:

"Gerron, having served twenty years as a simple soldier, acquired a great knowledge of military discipline. This man was not yet seventy years old. He had come to believe, partly from practice, partly from theory, that twenty blows with a baton on the rump are not dishonoring. When the honest soldier was unfortunate enough to deserve them, he accepted them with resignation. The pain was sharp, but not lasting; it did not deprive him of either appetite nor honor. . . Gerron, becoming a corporal, had obtained no idea of any kind of sorrow other than that coming from the blows of a baton on the rump. . . On this idea, he thought that the soul of an honest man was no different than a soldier's breech. If Gerron caused trouble to the spirit of a man of honor, he thought that this spirit, like his own, had only a rump, and that any trouble he caused would pass likewise. He deceived himself. The breech of the spirit of an honest man is different than the breech of the spirit of a Gerron who rendered compatible the rank of a military officer with the vile employments of a domestic and the stable-master of some particular lord. Since Gerron deceived himself, we must pardon him all his faults. . ." etc.

Casanova complained of the Faulkircher incident to the mother of Count Waldstein, who wrote: "I pity you, Monsieur, for being obliged to live among such people and in such evil company, but my son will not forget that which he owes to himself and I am sure he will give you all the satisfaction you wish." Also to his friend Zaguri, who wrote, the 16th March: "I hope that the gout in your hand will not torment you any more. . . You have told me the story I asked about and which begins: 'Two months have passed since an officer, who is at Vienna, insulted me!' I cannot understand whether he who wrote you an insulting letter is at Vienna or whether he is at Dux. When will the Count return? . . . You should await his return because you would have, among other reasons to present to him, that of not wishing to have recourse to other jurisdiction than his. . . You say your letters have been intercepted? Someone has put your portrait in the privy? The devil! It is a miracle that you have not killed someone. Positively, I am curious to know the results and I hope that you make no mistakes in this affair which appears to me very delicate."

In August 1792, or thereabouts, Da Ponte on his way to Dresden, visited Casanova at Dux, in the hope of collecting an old debt, but gave up this hope on realizing Casanava's limited resources. In the winter of 1792-3, Da Ponte found himself in great distress in Holland. "Casanova was the only man to whom I could apply", he writes in his Memoirs. "To better dispose him, I thought to write him in verse, depicting my troubles and begging him to send me some money on account of that which he still owed me. Far from considering my request, he contented himself with replying, in vulgar prose, by a laconic billet which I transcribe: 'When Cicero wrote to his friends, he avoided telling them of his affairs.' "

In May 1793, Da Ponte wrote from London: "Count Waldstein has lived a very obscure life in London, badly lodged, badly dressed, badly served, always in cabarets, cafes, with porters, with rascals, with . . .

we will leave out the rest. He has the heart of an angel and an excellent character, but not so good a head as ours. . ."

Toward the end of 1792, Casanova wrote a letter to Robespierre, which, as he advises M. Opiz the 13th January 1793, occupied one hundred and twenty folio pages. This letter was not to be found at Dux and it may possibly have been sent, or may have been destroyed by Casanova on the advice of the Abbé O'Kelly. Casanova's feelings were very bitter over the trial of Louis XVI, and in his letters to M. Opiz he complained bitterly of the Jacobins and predicted the ruin of France. Certainly, to Casanova, the French Revolution represented the complete overthrow of many of his cherished illusions.

On the 1st August 1793, Wilhelmina Rietz, Countess Lichtenau (called the Pompadour of Frederic-William II, King of Prussia) wrote to the librarian at Dux:

"Monsieur:

"It seems impossible to know where Count Valstaine (Waldstein) is staying, whether he is in Europe, Africa, America, or possibly the Megamiques. If he is there, you are the only one who could insure his receiving the enclosed letter.

"For my part, I have not yet had time to read their history, but the first reading I do will assuredly be that.

"Mademoiselle Chappuis has the honor of recalling herself to your memory, and I have that of being your very humble servant,

Wilhelmina Rietz"

The illusions to a "history" and to the Megamiques in this letter refer to Casanova's romance, Icosameron.

About this time, Count Waldstein returned to Dux after having been, at Paris, according to Da Ponte, concerned in planning the flight of Louis XVI and in attempting to save the Princess Lamballe. On the 17th August, Casanova replied to the above letter:

"Madame,

"I handed the Count your letter two minutes after having received it, finding him easily. I told him that he should respond at once, for the post was ready to go; but, as he begged to wait for the following ordinary, I did not insist. The day before yesterday, he begged me to wait again, but he did not find me so complaisant. I respond to you, Madame, for his carelessness in replying to letters is extreme; he is so shameful that he is in despair when he is obliged to it. Although he may not respond, be sure of seeing him at your house at Berlin after the Leipzig Fair, with a hundred bad excuses which you will laugh at and pretend to believe good ones . . . This last month, my wish to see Berlin again has become immeasurable, and I will do my best to have Count Waldstein take me there in the month of October or at least to permit me to go. . . You have given me an idea of Berlin far different than that the city left with me when I passed four months there twenty-nine years ago (X, 7). . . If my Icosameron interests you, I offer you its Spirit. I wrote it here two years ago and I would not have published it if I had not dared hope that the Theological Censor would permit it. At Berlin no one raised the least difficulty. . . If circumstances do not permit me to pay you my respects at Berlin, I hope for the happiness of seeing you here next year. . ."

Sometime after this and following his quarrel with M. Opiz, Casanova evidently passed through a period of depression, as indicated by a manuscript at Dux, headed "Short reflection of a philosopher who finds himself thinking of procuring his own death", and dated "the 13th December 1793, the day dedicated to S. Lucie, remarkable in my too long life."

"Life is a burden to me. What is the metaphysical being who prevents me from slaying myself? It is Nature. What is the other being who enjoins me to lighten the burdens of that life which brings me only feeble pleasures and heavy pains? It is Reason. Nature is a coward which, demanding only conservation, orders me to sacrifice all to its existence. Reason is a being which gives me resemblance to God, which treads instinct under foot and which teaches me to choose the best way after having well considered the reasons. It demonstrates to me that I am a man in imposing silence on the Nature which opposes that action which alone could remedy all my ills.

"Reason convinces me that the power I have of slaying myself is a privilege given me by God, by which I perceive that I am superior to all animals created in the world; for there is no animal who can slay itself nor think of slaying itself, except the scorpion, which poisons itself, but only when the fire which surrounds it convinces it that it cannot save itself from being burned. This animal slays itself because it fears fire more than death. Reason tells me imperiously that I have the right to slay myself, with the divine oracle of Cen: 'Qui non potest vivere bene non vivat male.' These eight words have such power that it is impossible that a man to whom life is a burden could do other than slay himself on first hearing them."

Certainly, however, Casanova did not deceive himself with these sophisms and Nature who for many years had unquestionably lavished her gifts on him, had her way.

Over the end of the year, the two mathematicians, Casanova and Opiz, at the request of Count Waldstein, made a scientific examination of the reform of the calendar as decreed the 5th October 1793 by the National Convention.

In January 1795, Casanova wrote to the Princess Lobkowitz to thank her for her gift of a little dog. On the 16th, the Princess wrote from Vienna:

"Monsieur,

"I am enchanted at the charming reception you accorded the dog which I sent you when I learned of the death of your well-loved greyhound, knowing that she would nowhere be better cared for than with you, Monsieur. I hope with all my heart that she has all the qualities which may, in some fashion, help you to forget the deceased. . ."

In the autumn of 1795, Casanova left Dux. The Prince de Ligne writes in his own Memoirs: "God directed him to leave Dux. Scarcely believing in more than his death, which he no longer doubted, he pretended that each thing he had done was by the direction of God and this was his guide. God directed him to ask me for letters of recommendation to the Duke of Weimar, who was my good friend, to the Duchess of Gotha, who did not know me, and to the jews of Berlin. And he departed secretly, leaving for Count Waldstein a letter at once tender, proud, honest and irritating. Waldstein laughed and said he would return. Casanova waited in ante-chambers; no one would place him either as governor, librarian or chamberlain. He said everywhere that the Germans were thorough beasts. The excellent and very amiable Duke of Weimar welcomed him wonderfully; but in an instant he became jealous of Goethe and Wieland, who were under the Count's protection. He declaimed against them and against the literature of the country which he did not, and could not, know. At Berlin, he declaimed against the ignorance, the superstition and the knavery of the Hebrews to whom I had addressed him, drawing meanwhile, for the money they claimed of him, bills of exchange on the Count who laughed, paid, and embraced him when he returned. Casanova laughed, wept, and told him that God had ordered him to make this trip of six weeks, to leave without speaking of it, and to return to his chamber at Dux. Enchanted at seeing us again, he agreeably related to us all the misfortunes which had tried him and to which his susceptibility gave the name of humiliations. "I am proud", he said, "because I am nothing. . . ." Eight days after his return, what new troubles! Everyone had been served strawberries before him, and none remained for him."

The Prince de Ligne, although he was Casanova's sincere friend and admirer, gives a rather sombre picture of Casanova's life at Dux: "It must not be imagined that he was satisfied to live quietly in the refuge provided him through the kindness of Waldstein. That was not within his nature. Not a day passed without trouble; something was certain to be wrong with the coffee, the milk, the dish of macaroni, which he required each day. There were always quarrels in the house. The cook had ruined his polenta, the coachman had given him a bad driver to bring him to see me, the dogs had barked all night, there had been more guests than usual and he had found it necessary to eat at a side table. Some hunting-horn had tormented his ear with its blasts; the priest had been trying to convert him; Count Waldstein had not anticipated his morning greeting; the servant had delayed with his wine; he had not been introduced to some distinguished personage who had come to see the lance which had pierced the side of the great Waldstein; the Count had lent a book without telling him; a groom had not touched his hat to him; his German speech had been misunderstood; he had become angry and people had laughed at him."

Like Count Waldstein, however, the Prince de Ligne made the widest allowances, understanding the chafing of Casanova's restless spirit. "Casanova has a mind without an equal, from which each word is extraordinary and each thought a book."

On the 16th December, he wrote Casanova: "One is never old with your heart, your genius and your stomach."

Casanova's own comment on his trip away from Dux will be found in the Memoirs (X, 3). "Two years ago, I set out for Hamburg, but my good genius made me return to Dux. What had I to do at Hamburg?"

On the 10th December, Casanova's brother Giovanni (Jean) died. He was the Director of the Academy of Painting at Dresden. Apparently the two brothers could not remain friends. Giovanni left two daughters, Teresa and Augusta, and two sons, Carlo and Lorenzo. While he was unable to remain friendly with his brother, Casanova apparently wished to be of assistance to his nieces, who were not in the best of circumstances, and he exchanged a number of letters with Teresa after her father's death.

On the occasion of Teresa Casanova's visit to Vienna in 1792, Princess Clary, oldest sister of the Prince de Ligne, wrote of her: "She is charming in every way, pretty as love, always amiable; she has had great success. Prince Kaunitz loves her to the point of madness."

In a letter of the 25th April 1796, Teresa assured her "very amiable and very dear uncle" that the cautions, which occupied three-fourths of his letter, were unnecessary; and compared him with his brother Francois, to the injury of the latter. On the 5th May, Teresa wrote: "Before thanking you for your charming letter, my very kind uncle, I should announce the issue of our pension of one hundred and sixty crowns a year, which is to say, eighty crowns apiece; I am well satisfied for I did not hope to receive so much." In the same letter, Teresa spoke of seeing much of a "charming man", Don Antonio, who was no other than the rascally adventurer Don Antonio della Croce with whom Casanova had been acquainted since 1753

(III, 14, etc.), who assisted Casanova in losing a thousand sequins at Milan in 1763 (VIII, 8), who in 1767, at Spa, following financial reverses, abandoned his pregnant mistress to the charge of Casanova (XI, 2), and who in August 1795, wrote to Casanova "Your letter gave me great pleasure as the sweet souvenir of our old friendship, unique and faithful over a period of fifty years."

It is probably that, at this time, Casanova visited Dresden and Berlin also. In his letter "To Leonard Snetlage", he writes: " 'That which proves that revolution should arrive', a profound thinker said to me in Berlin, last year, 'is that it has arrived.' "

On the 1st March, 1798, Carlo Angiolini, the son of Maria Maddalena, Casanova's sister, wrote to Casanova: "This evening, Teresa will marry M. le Chambellan de Veisnicht (Von Wessenig) whom you know well." This desirable marriage received the approval of Francesco also. Teresa, as the Baroness Wessenig, occupied a prominent social position at Dresden. She died in 1842.

Between the 13th February and the 6th December 1796, Casanova engaged in a correspondence with Mlle. Henriette de

Schuckmann who was visiting at Bayreuth. This Henriette (unfortunately not the Henriette of the Memoirs whose forty letters to Casanova (XI, 10) apparently have not been located) had visited the library at Dux in the summer of 1786. "I was with the Chamberlain Freiberg, and I was greatly moved, as much by your conversation as by your kindness which provided me with a beautiful edition of Metastasio, elegantly bound in red morocco." Finding herself at Bayreuth in an enforced idleness and wishing a stimulant, wishing also to borrow some books, she wrote Casanova, under the auspices of Count Koenig, a mutual friend, the 13th February 1786, recalling herself to his memory. Casanova responded to her overtures and five of her letters were preserved at Dux. On the 28th May, Henriette wrote:

"But certainly, my good friend, your letters have given me the greatest pleasure, and it is with a rising satisfaction that I pore over all you say to me. I love, I esteem, I cherish your frankness. . . I understand you perfectly and I love to distraction the lively and energetic manner with which you express yourself."

On the 30th September, she wrote: "You will read today, if you please, a weary letter; for your silence, Monsieur, has given me humors. A promise is a debt, and in your last letter you promised to write me at least a dozen pages. I have every right to call you a bad debtor; I could summon you before a court of justice; but all these acts of vengeance would not repair the loss which I have endured through my hope and my fruitless waiting. . . It is your punishment to read this trivial page; but although my head is empty, my heart is not so, and it holds for you a very living friendship."

In March 1797, this Henriette went to Lausanne and in May from there to her father's home at Mecklenburg.

IV. Correspondence With J. F. Opiz.

On the 27th July 1792, Casanova wrote M. Opiz that he had finished the twelfth volume of his Memoirs, with his age at forty-seven years (1772). "Our late friend, the worthy Count Max Josef Lamberg," he added, "could not bear the idea of my burning my Memoirs, and expecting to survive me, had persuaded me to send him the first four volumes. But now there is no longer any question that his good soul has left his organs. Three weeks ago I wept for his death, all the more so as he would still be living if he had listened to me. (VIII, 1). I am, perhaps, the only one who knows the truth. He who slew him was the surgeon Fenchter at Cremsir, who applied thirty-six mercurial plasters on a gland in his left groin which was swollen but not by the pox, as I am sure by the description he gave me of the cause of the swelling. The mercury mounted to his esophagus and, being able to swallow neither solids nor fluids, he died the 23d June of positive famine. . . The interest of the bungling surgeon is to say that he died of the pox. This is not true, I beg you to give the lie to anyone you hear saying it I have before my eyes 460 of his letters over which I weep and which I will burn. I have asked Count Leopold to burn mine, which he had saved, and I hope that he will please me by doing it. I have survived all my true friends. 'Tempus abire mihi est' Horace says to me.

"Returning to my 'Memoirs' . . . I am a detestable man; but I do not care about having it known, and I do not aspire to the honor of the detestation of posterity. My work is full of excellent moral instructions. But to what good, if the charming descriptions of my offences excite the readers more to action than to repentance? Furthermore, knowing readers would divine the names of all the women and of the men, which I have masked, whose transgressions are unknown to the world, my indiscretion would injure them, they would cry out against my perfidy, even though every word of my history were true . . . Tell me yourself whether or not I should burn my work? I am curious to have your advice."

On the 6th May 1793, Casanova wrote Opiz: "The letter of recommendation you ask of me to the professor my brother for your younger son, honors me; and there is no doubt that, having for you all the estimation your qualities merit, I should send it to you immediately. But this cannot be. And here is the reason. My brother is my enemy; he has given me sure indications of it and it appears that his hate will not cease until I no longer exist. I hope that he may long survive me and be happy. This desire is my only apology."

"The epigraph of the little work which I would give to the public," Casanova wrote the 23d August 1793, "is In pondere et mensura. It is concerned with gravity and measure. I would demonstrate not only that the course of the stars is irregular but also that it is susceptible only to approximate measures and that consequently we must join physical and moral calculations in establishing celestial movements. For I prove that all fixed axes must have a necessarily irregular movement of oscillation, from which comes a variation in all the necessary curves of the planets which compose their eccentricities and their orbits. I demonstrate that light has neither body nor spirit; I demonstrate that it comes in an instant from its respective star; I demonstrate the impossibility of many parallaxes and the uselessness of many others. I criticize not only Tiko-Brahi, but also Kepler and Newton. . .

"I wish to send you my manuscript and give you the trouble of publishing it with my name at Prague or elsewhere. . . I will sell it to the printer or to yourself for fifty florins and twenty-five copies on fine paper when it is printed."

But Opiz replied:

"As the father of a family, I do not feel myself authorized to dispose of my revenues on the impulse of my fancy or as my heart suggests . . . and no offer of yours could make me a book-seller"

As M. Adnesse remarks, this shows plainly enough that Opiz, for all his interest in Casanova, had not the qualities of true friendship.

On the 6th September 1793, Casanova wrote:

"I will have my Reveries printed at Dresden, and I will be pleased to send you a copy. I laughed a little at your fear that I would take offense because you did not want my manuscript by sending me the ridiculous sum I named to you. This refusal, my dear friend, did not offend me. On the contrary it was useful as an aid in knowing character. Add to this that in making the offer I thought to make you a gift. Fear nothing from the event. Your system of economy will never interfere with either my proceedings or my doctrines; and I am in no need of begging you, for I think that your action followed only your inclination and consequently your greatest pleasure."

On the insistence of Opiz, Casanova continued his correspondence, but he passed over nothing more, neither in exact quotations from Latin authors, nor solecisms, nor lame reasonings. He even reproached him for his poor writing and did not cease joking at the philanthropic and amiable sentiments Opiz loved to parade while at the same time keeping his purse-strings tight. A number of quarreling letters followed, after which the correspondence came to an end. One of Casanova's last letters, that of the 2d February 1794, concludes: "One day, M. de Bragadin said to me: 'Jacques, be careful never to convince a quibbler, for he will become your enemy.' After this wise advice I avoided syllogism, which tended toward conviction. But in spite of this you have become my enemy. . ."

Among Casanova's MSS at Dux was one giving his final comment on his relations with Opiz. Accusing Opiz of bringing about a quarrel, Casanova nevertheless admits that he himself may not be blameless, but lays this to his carelessness. "I have a bad habit," he writes, "of not reading over my letters. If, in re-reading those I wrote to M. Opiz, I had found them bitter, I would have burned them." Probably Casanova struck the root of the matter in his remark, "Perfect accord is the first charm of a reciprocal friendship." The two men were primarily of so different a temperament, that they apparently could not long agree even on subjects on which they were most in accord.

The complete correspondence is of very considerable interest.

V. Publications.

cember 1792, Zaguri wrote Casanova that Cagliostro was in prison at San Leo. "Twenty years ago, I told Cagliostro not to set his foot in Rome, and if he had followed this advice he would not have died miserably in a Roman prison." (XII, 9).

In January 1788, appeared 'Icosameron" a romance in five volumes, dedicated to Count Waldstein, which he describes as "translated from the English." This fanciful romance, which included philosophic and theological discussions, was the original work of Casanova and not a translation. It was criticized in 1789 by a literary journal at Jena. Preserved at Dux were several manuscripts with variants of Icosameron and also an unpublished reply to the criticism.

In 1788 Casanova published the history of his famous flight from The Leads. An article on this book appeared in the German Litteratur-Zeitung, 29th June 1789. "As soon as the history was published and while it was exciting much interest among us and among our neighbors, it was seen that other attempts at flight from prisons would make their appearance. The subject in itself is captivating; all prisoners awake our compassion, particularly when they are enclosed in a severe prison and are possibly innocent. . . The history with which we are concerned has all the appearances of truth; many Venetians have testified to it, and the principal character, M. Casanova, brother of the celebrated painter, actually lives at Dux in Bohemia where the Count Waldstein has established him as guardian of his important library."

In July 1789 there was discovered, among the papers of the Bastille, the letter which Casanova wrote from Augsburg in May 1767 to Prince Charles of Courlande on the subject of fabricating gold. Carra published this letter at once in Volume III of his Mémoires authentiques et historiques sur la Bastille. Casanova kept a copy of this letter and includes it in the Memoirs. (XI, 1).

In October 1789, Casanova wrote M. Opiz that he was writing to a professor of mathematics (M. Lagrange) at Paris, a long letter in Italian, on the duplication of the cube, which he wished to publish. In August 1790, Casanova published his Solution du Problème Déliaque démontrée and Deux corollaires à la duplication de hexaèdre. On the subject of his pretended solution of this problem in speculative mathematics, Casanova engaged with M. Opiz in a heated technical discussion between the 16th September and 1st November 1790. Casanova sought vainly to convince Opiz of the correctness of his solution. Finally, M. Opiz, tired of the polemics, announced that he was leaving on a six-week tour of inspection and that he would not be able to occupy himself with the duplication of the cube for some time to come. On the 1st November, Casanova wished him a pleasant journey and advised him to guard against the cold because "health is the soul of life."

In 1797, appeared the last book published during Casanova's lifetime, a small work entitled: A Leonard Snetlage, docteur en droit de l'Université de Goettingue, Jacques Casanova, docteur en droit de l'Université de Padoue. This was a careful criticism of the neologisms introduced into French by the Revolution. In reference to Casanova's title of "Doctor", researches by M. Favoro at the University of Padoua had failed to establish this claim, although, in the Memoirs (I, 4)

Digitized by Google

Casanova had written: "I remained at Padoua long enough to prepare myself for the Doctor's degree, which I intended to take the following year." M. Adnesse remarked: "With this devil of a man, it is always prudent to look twice before peremtorily questioning the truth of his statement." And in fact, the record of Casanova's matriculation was discovered by Signor Bruno Brunelli and announced in the Literary Supplement of "Figaro", the 1st September 1923.

VI. Summary of My Life.

The 2d November, 1797, Cecilia Roggendorff wrote to Casanova: "By the way, how do you call yourself, by your baptismal name? On what day and in what year were you born? You may laugh, if you wish, at my questions, but I command you to satisfy me . . ." To this request, Casanova responded with:

"Summary of My Life:—My mother brought me into the world at Venice on the 2d April, Easter day of the year 1725. She had, the night before, a strong desire for crawfish. I am very fond of them.

"At baptism, I was named Jacques-Jerome. I was an idiot until I was eight and a half years old. After having had a hemorrhage for three months, I was taken to Padua, where, cured of my imbecility, I applied myself to study and, at the age of sixteen years I was made a doctor and given the habit of a priest so that I might go seek my fortune at Rome.

"At Rome, the daughter of my French instructor was the cause of my being dismissed by my patron, Cardinal Aquaviva.

"At the age of eighteen years, I entered the military service of my country, and I went to Constantinople. Two years afterward, having returned to Venice, I left the profession of honor and, taking the bit in my teeth, embraced the wretched profession of a violinist. I horrified my friends, but this did not last for very long.

"At the age of twenty-one years, one of the highest nobles of Venice adopted me as his son, and, having become rich, I went to see Italy, France, Germany and Vienna where I knew Count Roggendorff. I returned to Venice, where, two years later, the State Inquisitors of Venice, for just and wise reasons, imprisoned me under The Leads.

"This was the state prison, from which no one had ever escaped, but, with the aid of God, I took flight at the end of fifteen months and went to Paris. In two years, my affairs prospered so well that I became worth a million, but, all the same, I went bankrupt. I made money in Holland, suffered misfortune in Stuttgart, was received with honors in Switzerland, visited M. de Voltaire, adventured in Genoa, Marseilles, Florence and in Rome where the Pope Rezzonico, a Venetian, made me a Chevalier of Saint-Jean-Latran and an apostolic protonotary. This was in the year 1760.

"In the same year I found good fortune at Naples; at Florence I carried off a girl; and, the following year, I was to attend the Congress at Augsburg, charged with a commission from the King of Portugal. The Congress did not meet there and, after the publication of peace, I passed on into England, which great misfortunes caused me to leave in the following year, 1764. I avoided the gibbet which, however, should not have dishonored me as I should only have been hung. In the same year I searched in vain for fortune at Berlin and at Petersburg, but I found it at Warsaw in the following year. Nine months afterwards, I lost it through being embroiled in a pistol duel with General Braniki; I pierced his abdomen but in eight months he was well again and I was very much pleased. He was a brave man. Obliged to leave Poland, I returned to Paris in 1767, but a lettre de cachet obliged me to leave and I went to Spain where I met with great misfortunes. I committed the crime of making nocturnal visits to the mistress of the vice-roi, who was a great scoundrel.

"At the frontiers of Spain, I escaped from assassins only to suffer, at Aix, in Provence, an illness which took me to the edge of the grave, after spitting blood for eighteen months.

"In the year 1769, I published my Defense of the Government of Venice, in three large volumes, written against Amelot de la Houssaie.

"In the following year the English Minister at the Court of Turin sent me, well recommended, to Leghorn. I wished to go to Constantinople with the Russian fleet, but as Admiral Orlof, would not meet my conditions, I retraced my steps and went to Rome under the pontificate of Ganganelli.

"A happy love affair made me leave Rome and go to Naples and, three months later, an unhappy love made me return to Rome. I had measured swords for the third time with Count Medini who died four years ago at London, in prison for his debts.

"Having considerable money, I went to Florence, where, during the Christmas Festival, the Archduke Leopold, the Emperor who died four or five years ago, ordered me to leave his dominions within three days. I had a mistress who, by my advice, became Marquise de * * * at Bologna.

"Weary of running about Europe, I determined to solicit mercy from the Venetian State Inquisitors. For this purpose, I established myself at Trieste where, two years later, I obtained it. This was the 14th September 1774. My return to Venice after nineteen years was the most pleasant moment of my life.

"In 1782, I became embroiled with the entire body of the Venetian nobility. At the beginning of 1783, I voluntarily left the ungrateful country and went to Vienna. Six months later I went to Paris with the intention of establishing myself there, but my brother, who had lived there for twenty-six years, made me forget my interests in favor of his. I rescued him from the hands of his wife and took him to Vienna where Prince Kaunitz engaged him to establish himself. He is still there, older than I am by two years.

"I placed myself in the service of M. Foscarini, Venetian Ambassador, to write dispatches. Two years later, he died in my arms, killed by the gout which mounted into his chest. I then set out for Berlin in the hope of securing a position with the Academy, but, half way there, Count Waldstein stopped me at Teplitz and led me to Dux where I still am and where, according to all appearances, I will die.

"This is the only summary of my life which I have written, and I permit any use of it which may be desired.

"Non erubesco evangelium.

"This 17th November 1797.

Jacques Casanova."

In reference to Casanova's ironic remark about his escape from England, see his conversation, on the subject of "dishonor", with Sir Augustus Hervey at London in 1763. (IX, 7).

VII. Last Days at Dux.

Scattered through the Memoirs are many of Casanova's thoughts about his old age. Some were possibly incorporated in the original text, others possibly added when he revised the text in 1797. These vary from resignation to bitterness, doubtless depending on Casanova's state of mind at the moment he wrote them.

"Now that I am seventy-two years old, I believe myself no longer susceptible of such follies. But alas! that is the very thing which causes me to be miserable." (I, 3). "I hate old age which offers only what I already know, unless I should take up a gazette." (I, 7). "Age has calmed my passions by rendering them powerless, but my heart has not grown old and my memory has kept all the freshness of youth." (II, 10). "No, I have not forgotten her (Henriette); for even now, when my head is covered with white hair, the recollection of her is still a source of happiness for my heart." (III, 3). "A scene which, even now, excites my mirth." (III, 5). "Age, that cruel and unavoidable disease, compels me to be in good health, in spite of myself." (III, 9). "Now that I am but the shadow of the once brilliant Casanova, I love to chatter." (III, 16). "Now that age has whitened my hair and deadened the ardor of my senses, my imagination does not take such a high flight and I think differently." (IV, 3). "What embitters my old age is that, having a heart as warm as ever, I have no longer the strength necessary to secure a single day as blissful as those which I owed to this charming girl." (IV, 6). "When I recall these events, I grow young again and feel once more the delights of youth, despite the long years which separate me from that happy time." (V, 5). "Now that I am getting into my dotage, I look on the dark side of everything. I am invited to a wedding and see nought but gloom; and, witnessing the coronation of Leopold II, at Prague, I say to myself, Nolo coronari. Cursed old age, thou art only worthy of dwelling in hell." (VI, 6). "The longer I live, the more interest I take in my papers. They are the treasure which attaches me to life and makes death more hateful still." (VI, 8).

And so on, through the Memoirs, Casanova supplies his own picture, knowing very well that the end, even of his cherished memories, is not far distant.

In 1797, Casanova relates an amusing, but irritating incident, which resulted in the loss of the first three chapters of Volume II of the Memoirs through the carelessness of a servant girl at Dux who took the papers "old, written upon, covered with scribbling and erasures," for "her own purposes," thus necessitating a re-writing "which I must now abridge" of these chapters. Thirty years before, Casanova would doubtless have made love to the girl and all would have been forgiven. But, alas for the "hateful old age" permitting no relief except irritation and impotent anger!

On the 1st August, 1797, Cecilia Roggendorff, the daughter of the Count Roggendorff (printed Roquendorf) whom Casanova had met at Vienna in 1753, wrote: "You tell me in one of your letters that, at your death, you will leave me, by your will, your Memoirs which occupy twelve volumes." At this time, Casanova was revising, or had completed his revision of, the twelve volumes. In July 1792, as mentioned above, Casanova wrote Opiz that he had arrived at the twelfth volume. In Volume 4 of the Memoirs themselves (IV, 5) we read, ". . . the various adventures which, at the age of seventy-two years, impel me to write these Memoirs. . .", written probably during a revision of this volume in 1797. At the beginning of one of the two chapters of Volume XII, which were missing until discovered by Mr. Symons at Dux in 1899, we read: "When I left Venice in the year 1783, God should have sent me to Rome, or to Naples, or to Sicily, or to Parma, where my old age, according to all appearances, might have been happy. My genius, who is always right, led me to Paris so that I might see my brother Francois, who had run into debt and who was at that moment going to the Temple. I do not care whether or not he owes me his regeneration, but I am glad to have affected it. If he had recognized me in it, I should have felt myself repaid; but I prefer that he should carry on his shoulders, the burden of the debt which, from time to time, should feel heavy to him. He deserves no greater punishment. Today, in the seventy-third year of my life, my only desire is to live in peace and far from anyone who might imagine himself as having rights over my moral liberty, for it is impossible for this imagination to be unaccompanied by a kind of tyranny."

Early in February, 1798, Casanova was taken sick with a very grave bladder trouble of which he died after suffering for three and a half months. On the 16th February, Zaguri wrote: "I note with the greatest sorrow the blow which has afflicted you." On the 31st March, after having consulted with a Prussian doctor, Zaguri sent a box of medicines; and he wrote frequently until the end.

On the 20th April, Elisa von der Recke, whom Casanova had met, some years before, at the chateau of the Prince de Ligne at Teplitz, having returned to Teplitz, wrote: "Your letter, my friend, has deeply affected me. Although myself ill, the first fair day which permits me to go out will find me at your side." On the 27th, Elisa, still bedridden, wrote that the Count de Montboisier and his wife were looking forward to visiting Casanova. On the 6th May she wrote, regretting that she was unable to send some crawfish soup, but that the rivers were too high for the peasants to secure the crawfish. "The Montboisier family, Milady Clark, my children and myself have all made vows for your recovery." On the 8th, she sent bouillon and madeira.

On the 4th June, 1798, Casanova died. His nephew, Carlo Angiolini was with him at the time. He was buried in the churchyard of Santa Barbara at Dux. The exact location of his grave is uncertain, but a tab-
